CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE FIFTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 6, 1897.

The first Monday of December being the day prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress, the second session of the Fifty-fifth Congress commenced this day.

The Senate assembled in its Chamber at the Capitol.

The VICE-PRESIDENT of the United States (Hon. GARRET A. HOBART, of the State of New Jersey) called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock meridian.

PRAYER.

Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate, offered the following prayer:

O Eternal God, while the heart of the nation bows reverently by the bedside of the venerable woman whose pulse beats faintly in life's last agony and turns from that hallowed scene to the filial-hearted son, our beloved President, pouring out upon both the love of the nation, grant, we beseech Thee, a quiet and peaceful passage to the celestial world of the noble and gracious mother, and the consolation of Thy Holy Spirit and the blessed hope of everlasting life, which Thou hast given us in Thy Son, to her afflicted children.

And now, as Thy servants here present come for the performance of their high and responsible duties as the representatives of the sovereign States of this great land, pour upon them the continual dew of Thy blessing. Grant them health and safety and peace and all good things. And may Thy Holy Spirit guide them and Thy Divine Providence shield and defend them.

Prosper our land. Give peace in our time, O Lord; and may this people rejoice in the goodness and beneficence of God, our Father. We humbly pray, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Thy Son. Amen.

SENATORS PRESENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary (Mr. WILLIAM R. COX) called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

From the State of—
Alabama—John T. Morgan and Edmund W. Pettus.
Arkansas—James H. Berry and James K. Jones.
California—George C. Perkins and Stephen M. White.
Colorado—Henry M. Teller and Edward O. Wolcott.
Connecticut—Joseph R. Hawley and Orville H. Platt.
Delaware—George Gray and Richard R. Kenney.
Florida—Stephen R. Mallory and Samuel Pasco.
Georgia—Augustus O. Bacon and Alexander S. Clay.
Idaho—Henry Heitfeld and George L. Shoup.
Illinois—Shelby M. Cullom and William E. Mason.
Indiana—Charles Warren Fairbanks and David Turpie.
Iowa—William B. Allison and John H. Gear.
Kansas—Lucien Baker and William A. Harris.
Kentucky—William J. Deboe.
Louisiana—Donelson Caffery and Samuel Douglas McEnery.

Virginia—John W. Daniel.
Washington—John L. Wilson.
West Virginia—Stephen B. Elkins and Charles J. Faulkner.
Wisconsin—John L. Mitchell and John C. Spooner.
Wyoming—Clarence D. Clark and Francis E. Warren.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MCLAURIN] is in the city, but that he is too ill to be present to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate; and Mr. ALLISON and Mr. GORMAN were appointed.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. CULLOM, it was Ordered, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock m. until otherwise ordered.

RECESS.

Mr. HALE (at 12 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess until 1 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 1 o'clock p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

At 1 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m. Mr. WILLIAM J. BROWNING, the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar of the Senate and delivered the following message:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has appeared, and that the House is ready to proceed to business.

I am further directed to inform the Senate that the House has passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed on the part of the House, to join the committee already appointed by the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may have to make.

I am also directed to inform the Senate that the Speaker has appointed Mr. DINGLEY, Mr. GROSVENOR, and Mr. BAILEY as the committee on the part of the House.

RECESS.

Mr. HALE (at 1 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.). Mr. President, I am informed that the House of Representatives has taken a recess until half past 1 o'clock. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess until that time.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 1 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. GORMAN, the committee appointed in conjunction with a similar committee of the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States, appeared below the bar, and

Mr. ALLISON said: Mr. President, the committee appointed by the Senate, with a like committee on the part of the House of Representatives, to inform the President that a quorum of each House of Congress is now in session and ready to receive any communication he may wish to make have discharged that duty, and the President replied that he would immediately communicate to the two Houses in writing. He also expressed the hope that the deliberations of Congress may result in great good and reflect honor upon the Congress itself.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

At 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m., Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of the secretaries of the President of the United States, appeared below the bar, and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

The message was received from the secretary and handed to the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the message of the President of the United States, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the message, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

It gives me pleasure to extend greeting to the Fifty-fifth Congress, assembled in regular session at the seat of Government, with many of whose Senators and Representatives I have been associated in the legislative service. Their meeting occurs under felicitous conditions, justifying sincere congratulation and calling for our grateful acknowledgment to a beneficent Providence which has so signally blessed and prospered us as a nation. Peace and good will with all the nations of the earth continue unbroken.

A matter of genuine satisfaction is the growing feeling of fraternal regard and unification of all sections of our country, the incompleteness of which has too long delayed realization of the highest blessings of the Union. The spirit of patriotism is universal and is ever increasing in fervor. The public questions which now must engross us are lifted far above either partisanship, prejudice, or former sectional differences. They affect every part of our common country alike and permit of no division on ancient lines. Questions of foreign policy, of revenue, the soundness of the currency, the inviolability of national obligations, the improvement of the public service, appeal to the individual conscience of every earnest citizen to whatever party he belongs or in whatever section of the country he may reside.

The extra session of this Congress which closed during July last enacted important legislation, and while its full effect has not yet been realized, what it has already accomplished assures us of its timeliness and wisdom. To test its permanent value, further time will be required, and the people, satisfied with its operation and results thus far, are in no mind to withhold from it a fair trial.

Tariff legislation having been settled by the extra session of Congress, the question next pressing for consideration is that of the currency.

The work of putting our finances upon a sound basis, difficult as it may seem, will appear easier when we recall the financial operations of the Government since 1866. On the 30th day of June of that year we had outstanding demand liabilities in the sum of $728,868,447.41. On the 1st of January, 1879, these liabilities had been reduced to $443,889,495.88. Of our interest-bearing obligations, the figures are even more striking. On July 1, 1866, the principal of the interest-bearing debt of the Government was $2,332,331,208. On the 1st day of July, 1893, this sum had been reduced to $585,037,100, or an aggregate reduction of $1,747,294,108. The interest-bearing debt of the United States on the 1st day of December, 1897, was $847,365,620. The Government money now outstanding (December 1) consists of $346,681,016 of United States notes, $107,793,280 of Treasury notes issued by authority of the law of 1890, $384,963,504 of silver certificates, and $61,280,761 of standard silver dollars.

With the great resources of the Government and with the honorable example of the past before us, we ought not to hesitate to enter upon a currency revision which will make our demand obligations less onerous to the Government and relieve our financial laws from ambiguity and doubt.

The brief review of what was accomplished from the close of the war to 1893 makes unreasonable and groundless any distrust either of our financial ability or soundness; while the situation from 1893 to 1897 must admonish Congress of the immediate necessity of so legislating as to make the return of the conditions then prevailing impossible.

There are many plans proposed as a remedy for the evil. Before we can find the true remedy we must appreciate the real evil. It is not that our currency of every kind is not good, for every dollar of it is good; good because the Government's pledge is out to keep it so, and that pledge will not be broken. However, the guaranty of our purpose to keep the pledge will be best shown by advancing toward its fulfillment.

The evil of the present system is found in the great cost to the Government of maintaining the parity of our different forms of money, that is, keeping all of them at par with gold. We surely can not be longer heedless of the burden this imposes upon the people, even under fairly prosperous conditions, while the past four years have demonstrated that it is not only an expensive charge upon the Government, but a dangerous menace to the national credit.

It is manifest that we must devise some plan to protect the Government against bond issues for repeated redemptions. We must either curtail the opportunity for speculation, made easy by the multiplied redemptions of our demand obligations, or increase the gold reserve for their redemption. We have $900,000,000 of currency which the Government by solemn enactment has undertaken to keep at par with gold. Nobody is obliged to redeem in gold but the Government. The banks are not required to redeem in gold. The Government is obliged to keep equal with gold all its outstanding currency and coin obligations, while its receipts are not required to be paid in gold. They are paid in every kind of money but gold, and the only means by which the Government can with certainty get gold is by borrowing. It can get it in no other way when it most needs it. The Government, without any fixed gold revenue, is pledged to maintain gold redemption, which it has steadily and faithfully done, and which under the authority now given it will continue to do.

The law which requires the Government after having redeemed its United States notes to pay them out again as current funds demands a constant replenishment of the gold reserve. This is especially so in times of business panic and when the revenues are insufficient to meet the expenses of the Government. At such times the Government has no other way to supply its deficit and maintain redemption but through the increase of its bonded debt, as during the Administration of my predecessor, when $262,315,400 of 4½ per cent bonds were issued and sold and the proceeds used to pay the expenses of the Government in excess of the revenues and sustain the gold reserve. While it is true that the greater part of the proceeds of these bonds were used to supply deficient revenues, a considerable portion was required to maintain the gold reserve.

With our revenues equal to our expenses, there would be no deficit requiring the issuance of bonds. But if the gold reserve falls below $100,000,000, how will it be replenished except by selling more bonds? Is there any other way practicable under existing law? The serious question then is, Shall we continue the policy that has been pursued in the past; that is, when the gold reserve reaches the point of danger, issue more bonds and supply the needed gold, or shall we provide other means to prevent these recurring drains upon the gold reserve? If no further legislation is had and the policy of selling bonds is to be continued, then Congress should give the Secretary of the Treasury authority to sell bonds at long or short periods, bearing a less rate of interest than is now authorized by law.

I earnestly recommend, as soon as the receipts of the Government are quite sufficient to pay all the expenses of the Government, that when any of the United States notes are presented for redemption in gold and are redeemed in gold, such notes shall be kept and set apart, and only paid out in exchange for gold. This is an obvious duty. If the holder of the United States note prefers the gold and gets it from the Government, he should not receive back from the Government a United States note without paying gold in exchange for it. The reason for this is made all the more apparent when the Government issues an interest-bearing debt to provide gold for the redemption of United States notes—a non-interest-bearing debt. Surely it should not pay them out again except on demand and for gold. If they are put out in any other way, they may return again to be followed by another bond issue to redeem them—another interest-bearing debt to redeem a non-interest-bearing debt.

In my view it is of the utmost importance that the Government should be relieved from the burden of providing all the gold required for exchanges and export. This responsibility is alone borne by the Government without any of the usual and necessary banking powers to help itself. The banks do not feel the strain of gold redemption. The whole strain rests upon the Government, and the size of the gold reserve in the Treasury has come to be, with or without reason, the signal of danger or of security. This ought to be stopped.

If we are to have an era of prosperity in the country, with sufficient receipts for the expenses of the Government, we may feel no immediate embarrassment from our present currency; but the danger still exists and will be ever present menacing us so long as the existing system continues. And besides, it is in times of adequate revenues and business tranquillity that the Government should prepare for the worst. We can not avoid without serious consequences the wise consideration and prompt solution of this question.

The Secretary of the Treasury has outlined a plan in great detail for the purpose of removing the threatened recurrence of a depleted gold reserve and save us from future embarrassment on that account. To this plan I invite your careful consideration.

I concur with the Secretary of the Treasury in his recommendation that national banks be allowed to issue notes to the face value of the bonds which they have deposited for circulation, and that the tax on circulating notes secured by deposit of such bonds be reduced to one-half of 1 per cent per annum. I also join him in recommending that authority be given for the establishment of national banks with a minimum capital of $25,000. This will enable the smaller villages and agricultural regions of the country to be supplied with currency to meet their needs.

I recommend that the issue of national-bank notes be restricted to the denomination of $10 and upward. If the suggestions I have herein made shall have the approval of Congress, then I would recommend that national banks be required to redeem their notes in gold.

The most important problem with which this Government is now called upon to deal pertaining to its foreign relations concerns its duty toward Spain and the Cuban insurrection. Problems and conditions more or less in common with those now existing have confronted this Government at various times in the past. The story of Cuba for many years has been one of unrest; growing discontent; an effort toward a larger enjoyment of liberty and self-control; of organized resistance to the mother country; of depression after distress and warfare, and of ineffectual settlement to be followed by renewed revolt. For no enduring period since the enfranchisement of the continental possessions of Spain in the Western Continent has the condition of Cuba or the policy of Spain toward Cuba not caused concern to the United States.

The prospect from time to time that the weakness of Spain's hold upon the island and the political vicissitudes and embarrassments of the home government might lead to the transfer of Cuba to a continental power called forth, between 1823 and 1860, various emphatic declarations of the policy of the United States to permit no disturbance of Cuba's connection with Spain unless in the direction of independence or acquisition by us through purchase; nor has there been any change of this declared policy since upon the part of the Government.

The revolution which began in 1868 lasted for ten years despite the strenuous efforts of the successive peninsular governments to suppress it. Then, as now, the Government of the United States testified its grave concern and offered its aid to put an end to bloodshed in Cuba. The overtures made by General Grant were refused and the war dragged on, entailing great loss of life and treasure and increased injury to American interests, besides throwing enhanced burdens of neutrality upon this Government. In 1878 peace was brought about by the truce of Zanjon, obtained by negotiations between the Spanish commander, Martinez de Campos, and the insurgent leaders.

The present insurrection broke out in February, 1895. It is not my purpose at this time to recall its remarkable increase or to characterize its tenacious resistance against the enormous forces massed against it by Spain. The revolt and the efforts to subdue it carried destruction to every quarter of the island, developing wide proportions and defying the efforts of Spain for its suppression. The civilized code of war has been disregarded, no less so by the Spaniards than by the Cubans.

The existing conditions can not but fill this Government and the American people with the gravest apprehension. There is no desire on the part of our people to profit by the misfortunes of Spain. We have only the desire to see the Cubans prosperous and contented, enjoying that measure of self-control which is the inalienable right of man, protected in their right to reap the benefit of the exhaustless treasures of their country.

The offer made by my predecessor in April, 1896, tendering the friendly offices of this Government failed. Any mediation on our part was not accepted. In brief, the answer read: "There is no effectual way to pacify Cuba unless it begins with the actual submission of the rebels to the mother country." Then only could Spain act in the promised direction, of her own motion and after her own plans.

The cruel policy of concentration was initiated February 16, 1896. The productive districts controlled by the Spanish armies were depopulated. The agricultural inhabitants were herded in and about the garrison towns, their lands laid waste, and their dwellings destroyed. This policy the late cabinet of Spain justified as a necessary measure of war and as a means of cutting off supplies from the insurgents. It has utterly failed as a war measure. It was not civilized warfare. It was extermination.

Against this abuse of the rights of war I have felt constrained on repeated occasions to enter the firm and earnest protest of this Government. There was much of public condemnation of the treatment of American citizens by alleged illegal arrests and long imprisonment awaiting trial or pending protracted judicial proceedings. I felt it my first duty to make instant demand for the release or speedy trial of all American citizens under arrest. Before the change of the Spanish cabinet in October last twenty-two prisoners, citizens of the United States, had been given their freedom.

For the relief of our own citizens suffering because of the conflict the aid of Congress was sought in a special message, and under the appropriation of April 4, 1897, effective aid has been given to American citizens in Cuba, many of them at their own request having been returned to the United States.

The instructions given to our new minister to Spain before his departure for his post directed him to impress upon that Government the sincere wish of the United States to lend its aid toward the ending of the war in Cuba by reaching a peaceful and lasting result, just and honorable alike to Spain and to the Cuban people. These instructions recited the character and duration of the contest, the widespread losses it entails, the burdens and restraints it imposes upon us, with constant disturbance of national interests, and the injury resulting from an indefinite continuance of this state of things. It was stated that at this juncture our Government was constrained to seriously inquire if the time was not ripe when Spain of her own volition, moved by her own interests and every sentiment of humanity, should put a stop to this destructive war and make proposals of settlement, honorable to herself and just to her Cuban colony. It was urged that as a neighboring nation, with large interests in Cuba, we could be required to wait only a reasonable time for the mother country to establish its authority and restore peace and order within the borders of the island; that we could not contemplate an indefinite period for the accomplishment of this result.

No solution was proposed to which the slightest idea of humiliation to Spain could attach, and indeed precise proposals were withheld to avoid embarrassment to that Government. All that was asked or expected was that some safe way might be speedily provided and permanent peace restored. It so chanced that the consideration of this offer, addressed to the same Spanish administration which had declined the tenders of my predecessor and which for more than two years had poured men and treasure into Cuba in the fruitless effort to suppress the revolt, fell to others. Between the departure of General Woodford, the new envoy, and his arrival in Spain the statesman who had shaped the policy of his country fell by the hand of an assassin, and although the cabinet of the late premier still held office and received from our envoy the proposals he bore, that cabinet gave place within a few days thereafter to a new administration, under the leadership of Sagasta.

The reply to our note was received on the 23d day of October. It is in the direction of a better understanding. It appreciates the friendly purposes of this Government. It admits that our country is deeply affected by the war in Cuba and that its desires for peace are just. It declares that the present Spanish Government is bound by every consideration to a change of policy that should satisfy the United States and pacify Cuba within a reasonable time. To this end Spain has decided to put into effect the political reforms heretofore advocated by the present premier without halting for any consideration in the path which in its judgment leads to peace. The military operations, it is said, will continue, but will be humane and conducted with all regard for private rights, being accompanied by political action leading to the autonomy of Cuba while guarding Spanish sovereignty. This, it is claimed, will result in investing Cuba with a distinct personality, the island to be governed by an executive and by a local council or chamber, reserving to Spain the control of the foreign relations, the army and navy, and the judicial administration. To accomplish this the present Government proposes to modify existing legislation by decree, leaving the Spanish Cortes, with the aid of Cuban senators and deputies, to solve the economic problem and properly distribute the existing debt.

In the absence of a declaration of the measures that this Government proposes to takein carrying out its proffer of good offices, it suggests that Spain be left free to conduct military operations and grant political reforms, while the United States for its part shall enforce its neutral obligations and cut off the assistance which it is asserted the insurgents receive from this country. The supposition of an indefinite prolongation of the war is denied. It is asserted that the western provinces are already well-nigh reclaimed, that the planting of cane and tobacco therein has been resumed, and that by force of arms and new and ample reforms very early and complete pacification is hoped for.

The immediate amelioration of existing conditions under the new administration of Cuban affairs is predicted, and therewithal the disturbance and all occasion for any change of attitude on the part of the United States. Discussion of the question of the international duties and responsibilities of the United States as Spain understands them is presented, with an apparent disposition to charge us with failure in this regard. This charge is without any basis in fact. It could not have been made if Spain had been cognizant of the constant efforts this Government has made at the cost of millions and by the employment of the administrative machinery of the nation at command to perform its full duty according to the law of nations. That it has successfully prevented the departure of a single military expedition or armed vessel from our shores in violation of our laws would seem to be a sufficient answer. But of this aspect of the Spanish note it is not necessary to speak further now. Firm in the conviction of a wholly performed obligation, due response to this charge has been made in diplomatic course.

Throughout all these horrors and dangers to our own peace this Government has never in any way abrogated its sovereign prerogative of reserving to itself the determination of its policy and course according to its own high sense of right and in consonance with the dearest interests and convictions of our own people should the prolongation of the strife so demand.

Of the untried measures there remain only: Recognition of the insurgents as belligerents; recognition of the independence of Cuba; neutral intervention to end the war by imposing a rational compromise between the contestants, and intervention in favor of one or the other party. I speak not of forcible annexation, for that can not be thought of. That by our code of morality would be criminal aggression.

Recognition of the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents has often been canvassed as a possible if not inevitable step both in regard to the previous ten years' struggle and during the present war. I am not unmindful that the two Houses of Congress in the spring of 1896 expressed the opinion by concurrent resolution that a condition of public war existed requiring or justifying the recognition of a state of belligerency in Cuba, and during the extra session the Senate voted a joint resolution of like import, which, however, was not brought to a vote in the House of Representatives. In the presence of these significant expressions of the sentiment of the legislative branch it behooves the Executive to soberly consider the conditions under which so important a measure must needs rest for justification. It is to be seriously considered whether the Cuban insurrection possesses beyond dispute the attributes of statehood which alone can demand the recognition of belligerency in its favor. Possession, in short, of the essential qualifications of sovereignty by the insurgents and the conduct of the war by them according to the received code of war are no less important factors toward the determination of the problem of belligerency than are the influences and consequences of the struggle upon the internal polity of the recognizing State.

The wise utterances of President Grant in his memorable message of December 7, 1875, are signally relevant to the present situation in Cuba, and it may be wholesome now to recall them. At that time a ruinous conflict had for seven years wasted the neighboring island. During all those years an utter disregard of the laws of civilized warfare and of the just demands of humanity, which called forth expressions of condemnation from the nations of Christendom, continued unabated. Desolation and ruin pervaded that productive region, enormously affecting the commerce of all commercial nations, but that of the United States more than any other by reason of proximity and larger trade and intercourse. At that juncture General Grant uttered these words, which now, as then, sum up the elements of the problem:

"A recognition of the independence of Cuba being, in my opinion, impracticable and indefensible, the question which next presents itself is that of the recognition of belligerent rights in the parties to the contest. In a former message to Congress I had occasion to consider this question, and reached the conclusion that the conflict in Cuba, dreadful and devastating as were its incidents, did not rise to the fearful dignity of war. * * * It is possible that the acts of foreign powers, and even acts of Spain herself, of this very nature, might be pointed to in defense of such recognition. But now, as in its past history, the United States should carefully avoid the false lights which might lead it into the mazes of doubtful law and of questionable propriety, and adhere rigidly and sternly to the rule, which has been its guide, of doing only that which is right and honest and of good report. The question of according or of withholding rights of belligerency must be judged, in every case, in view of the particular attending facts. Unless justified by necessity, it is always, and justly, regarded as an unfriendly act and a gratuitous demonstration of moral support to the rebellion. It is necessary, and it is required, when the interests and rights of another government or of its people are so far affected by a pending civil conflict as to require a definition of its relations thereto. But this conflict must be one which will be recognized in the sense of international law as war.

"Belligerence, too, is a fact. The mere existence of contending armed bodies, and their occasional conflicts, do not constitute war in the sense referred to. Applying to the existing condition of affairs in Cuba the tests recognized by publicists and writers on international law, and which have been observed by nations of dignity, honesty, and power, when free from sensitive or selfish and unworthy motives, I fail to find in the insurrection the existence of such a substantial political organization, real, palpable, and manifest to the world, having the forms and capable of the ordinary functions of government toward its own people and to other states, with courts for the administration of justice, with a local habitation, possessing such organization of force, such material, such occupation of territory as to take the contest out of the category of a mere rebellious insurrection, or occasional skirmishes, and place it on the terrible footing of war, to which a recognition of belligerency would aim to elevate it.

"The contest, moreover, is solely on land; the insurrection has not possessed itself of a single seaport whence it may send forth its flag, nor has it any means of communication with foreign powers except through the military lines of its adversaries. No apprehension of any of those sudden and difficult complications which a war upon the ocean is apt to precipitate upon the vessels, both commercial and national, and upon the consular officers of other powers, calls for the definition of their relations to the parties to the contest. Considered as a question of expediency, I regard the accordance of belligerent rights still to be as unwise and premature as I regard it to be at present indefensible as a measure of right.

"Such recognition entails upon the country according the rights which flow from it difficult and complicated duties, and requires the exaction from the contending parties of the strict observance of their rights and obligations. It confers the right of search upon the high seas by vessels of both parties; it would subject the carrying of arms and munitions of war, which now may be transported freely and without interruption in vessels of the United States, to detention and to possible seizure; it would give rise to countless vexatious questions, would release the parent Government from responsibility for acts done by the insurgents, and would invest Spain with the right to exercise the supervision, recognized by our treaty of 1795, over our commerce on the high seas, a very large part of which, in its traffic between the Atlantic and the Gulf States and between all of them and the States on the Pacific, passes through the waters which wash the shores of Cuba. The exercise of this supervision could scarce fail to lead, if not to abuses, certainly to collisions perilous to the peaceful relations of the two States. There can be little doubt as to what result such supervision would before long draw this nation. It would be unworthy of the United States to inaugurate the possibilities of such result by measures of questionable right or expediency or by any indirection."

Turning to the practical aspects of a recognition of belligerency and reviewing its inconveniences and positive dangers, still further pertinent considerations appear. In the code of nations there is no such thing as a naked recognition of belligerency unaccompanied by the assumption of international neutrality. Such recognition without more will not confer upon either party to a domestic conflict a status not theretofore actually possessed or affect the relation of either party to other states. The act of recognition usually takes the form of a solemn proclamation of neutrality which recites the de facto condition of belligerency as its motive. It announces a domestic law of neutrality in the declaring state. It assumes the international obligations of a neutral in the presence of a public state of war. It warns all citizens and others within the jurisdiction of the proclaimant that they violate those rigorous obligations at their own peril and can not expect to be shielded from the consequences. The right of visit and search on the seas and seizure of vessels and cargoes and contraband of war and good prize under admiralty law must under international law be admitted as a legitimate consequence of a proclamation of belligerency. While according the equal belligerent rights defined by public law to each party in our ports, disfavors would be imposed on both which, while nominally equal, would weigh heavily in behalf of Spain herself. Possessing a navy and controlling the ports of Cuba, her maritime rights could be asserted not only for the military investment of the island, but up to the margin of our own territorial waters, and a condition of things would exist for which the Cubans within their own domain could not hope to create a parallel; while its creation through aid or sympathy from within our domain would be even more impossible than now, with the additional obligations of international neutrality we would perforce assume.

The enforcement of this enlarged and onerous code of neutrality would only be influential within our own jurisdiction by land and sea and applicable by our own instrumentalities. It could impart to the United States no jurisdiction between Spain and the insurgents. It would give the United States no right of intervention to enforce the conduct of the strife within the paramount authority of Spain according to the international code of war.

For these reasons, I regard the recognition of the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents as now unwise and therefore inadmissible. Should that step hereafter be deemed wise as a measure of right and duty the Executive will take it.

Intervention upon humanitarian grounds has been frequently suggested and has not failed to receive my most anxious and earnest consideration. But should such a step be now taken when it is apparent that a hopeful change has supervened in the policy of Spain toward Cuba? A new government has taken office in the mother country. It is pledged in advance to the declaration that all the effort in the world can not suffice to maintain peace in Cuba by the bayonet; that vague promises of reform after subjugation afford no solution of the insular problem; that with a substitution of commanders must come a change of the past system of warfare for one in harmony with a new policy which shall no longer aim to drive the Cubans to the "horrible alternative of taking to the thicket or succumbing in misery;" that reforms must be instituted in accordance with the needs and circumstances of the time, and that these reforms, while designed to give full autonomy to the colony and to create a virtual entity and self-controlled administration, shall yet conserve and affirm the sovereignty of Spain by a just distribution of powers and burdens upon a basis of mutual interest untainted by methods of selfish expediency.

The first acts of the new government lie in these honorable paths. The policy of cruel rapine and extermination that so long shocked the universal sentiment of humanity has been reversed. Under the new military commander a broad clemency is proffered. Measures have already been set on foot to relieve the horrors of starvation. The power of the Spanish armies, it is asserted, is to be used not to spread ruin and desolation, but to protect the resumption of peaceful agricultural pursuits and productive industries. That past methods are futile to force a peace by subjugation is freely admitted, and that ruin without conciliation must inevitably fail to win for Spain the fidelity of a contented dependency.

Decrees in application of the foreshadowed reforms have already been promulgated. The full text of these decrees has not been received, but as furnished in a telegraphic summary from our minister are: All civil and electoral rights of peninsular Spaniards are, in virtue of existing constitutional authority, forthwith extended to colonial Spaniards. A scheme of autonomy has been proclaimed by decree, to become effective upon ratification by the Cortes. It creates a Cuban parliament which, with the insular executive, can consider and vote upon all subjects affecting local order and interests, possessing unlimited powers save as to matters of state, war, and the navy, as to which the Governor-General acts by his own authority as the delegate of the central government. This parliament receives the oath of the Governor-General to preserve faithfully the liberties and privileges of the colony, and to it the colonial secretaries are responsible. It has the right to propose to the central government, through the Governor-General, modifications of the national charter and to invite new projects of law or executive measures in the interest of the colony.

Besides its local powers, it is competent, first, to regulate electoral registration and procedure and prescribe the qualifications of electors and the manner of exercising suffrage; second, to organize courts of justice with native judges from members of the local bar; third, to frame the insular budget both as to expenditures and revenues, without limitation of any kind, and to set apart the revenues to meet the Cuban share of the national budget, which latter will be voted by the national Cortes with the assistance of Cuban senators and deputies; fourth, to initiate or take part in the negotiations of the national government for commercial treaties which may affect Cuban interests; fifth, to accept or reject commercial treaties which the national government may have concluded without the participation of the Cuban government; sixth, to frame the colonial tariff, acting in accord with the peninsular government in scheduling articles of mutual commerce between the mother country and the colonies. Before introducing or voting upon a bill, the Cuban government or the chambers will lay the project before the central government and hear its opinion thereon, all the correspondence in such regard being made public. Finally, all conflicts of jurisdiction arising between the different municipal, provincial, and insular assemblies, or between the latter and the insular executive power, and which from their nature may not be referable to the central government for decision, shall be submitted to the courts.

That the government of Sagasta has entered upon a course from which recession with honor is impossible can hardly be questioned; that in the few weeks it has existed it has made earnest of the sincerity of its professions is undeniable. I shall not impugn its sincerity, nor should impatience be suffered to embarrass it in the task it has undertaken. It is honestly due to Spain and to our friendly relations with Spain that she should be given a reasonable chance to realize her expectations and to prove the asserted efficacy of the new order of things to which she stands irrevocably committed. She has recalled the commander whose brutal orders inflamed the American mind and shocked the civilized world. She has modified the horrible order of concentration and has undertaken to care for the helpless and permit those who desire to resume the cultivation of their fields to do so and assures them of the protection of the Spanish Government in their lawful occupations. She has just released the Competitor prisoners heretofore sentenced to death and who have been the subject of repeated diplomatic correspondence during both this and the preceding Administration.

Not a single American citizen is now in arrest or confinement in Cuba of whom this Government has any knowledge. The near future will demonstrate whether the indispensable condition of a righteous peace, just alike to the Cubans and to Spain as well as equitable to all our interests so intimately involved in the welfare of Cuba, is likely to be attained. If not, the exigency of further and other action by the United States will remain to be taken. When that time comes that action will be determined in the line of indisputable right and duty. It will be faced, without misgiving or hesitancy in the light of the obligation this Government owes to itself, to the people who have confided to it the protection of their interests and honor and to humanity.

Sure of the right, keeping free from all offense ourselves, actuated only by upright and patriotic considerations, moved neither by passion nor selfishness, the Government will continue its watchful care over the rights and property of American citizens and will abate none of its efforts to bring about by peaceful agencies a peace which shall be honorable and enduring. If it shall hereafter appear to be a duty imposed by our obligations to ourselves, to civilization, and humanity to intervene with force, it shall be without fault on our part and only because the necessity for such action will be so clear as to command the support and approval of the civilized world.

By a special message, dated the 16th day of June last, I laid before the Senate a treaty signed that day by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and of the Republic of Hawaii, having for its purpose the incorporation of the Hawaiian Islands as an integral part of the United States and under its sovereignty. The Senate having removed the injunction of secrecy, although the treaty is still pending before that body, the subject may be properly referred to in this message, because the necessary action of the Congress is required to determine by legislation many details of the eventual union should the fact of annexation be accomplished, as I believe it should be.

While consistently disavowing from a very early period any aggressive policy of absorption in regard to the Hawaiian group, a long series of declarations through three-quarters of a century has proclaimed the vital interest of the United States in the independent life of the islands and their intimate commercial dependence upon this country. At the same time it has been repeatedly asserted that in no event could the entity of Hawaiian statehood cease by the passage of the islands under the domination or influence of another power than the United States. Under these circumstances, the logic of events required that annexation, heretofore offered but declined, should in the ripeness of time come about as the natural result of the strengthening ties that bind us to those islands, and be realized by the free will of the Hawaiian State.

That treaty was unanimously ratified without amendment by the Senate and President of the Republic of Hawaii on the 10th of September last, and only awaits the favorable action of the American Senate to effect the complete absorption of the islands into the domain of the United States. What the conditions of such a union shall be, the political relation thereof to the United States, the character of the local administration, the quality and degree of the elective franchise of the inhabitants, the extension of the Federal laws to the territory or the enactment of special laws to fit the peculiar condition thereof, the regulation if need be of the labor system therein, are all matters which the treaty has wisely relegated to the Congress.

If the treaty is confirmed, as every consideration of dignity and honor requires, the wisdom of Congress will see to it that, avoiding abrupt assimilation of elements perhaps hardly yet fitted to share in the highest franchises of citizenship, and having due regard to the geographical conditions, the most just provisions for self-rule in local matters with the largest political liberties as an integral part of our nation will be accorded to the Hawaiians. No less is due to a people who, after nearly five years of demonstrated capacity to fulfill the obligations of self-governing statehood, come of their free will to merge their destinies in our body politic.

The questions which have arisen between Japan and Hawaii by reason of the treatment of Japanese laborers emigrating to the islands under the Hawaiian-Japanese convention of 1888 are in a satisfactory stage of settlement by negotiation. This Government has not been invited to mediate, and, on the other hand, has sought no intervention in that matter, further than to evince its kindliest disposition toward such a speedy and direct adjustment by the two sovereign States in interest as shall comport with equity and honor. It is gratifying to learn that the apprehensions at first displayed on the part of Japan lest the cessation of Hawaii's national life through annexation might impair privileges to which Japan honorably laid claim have given place to confidence in the uprightness of this Government and in the sincerity of its purpose to deal with all possible ulterior questions in the broadest spirit of friendliness.

As to the representation of this Government to Nicaragua, Salvador, and Costa Rica, I have concluded that Mr. William L. Merry, confirmed as minister of the United States to the States of Nicaragua, Salvador, and Costa Rica, shall proceed to San Jose, Costa Rica, and there temporarily establish the headquarters of the United States to those three States. I took this action for what I regarded as the paramount interests of this country. It was developed upon an investigation by the Secretary of State that the Government of Nicaragua, while not unwilling to receive Mr. Merry in his diplomatic quality, was unable to do so because of the compact concluded June 20, 1895, whereby that Republic and those of Salvador and Honduras, forming what is known as the Greater Republic of Central America, had surrendered to the representative Diet thereof their right to receive and send diplomatic agents. The Diet was not willing to accept him because he was not accredited to that body. I could not accredit him to that body because the appropriation law of Congress did not permit it. Mr. Baker, the present minister at Managua, has been directed to present his letters of recall.

Mr. W. Godfrey Hunter has likewise been accredited to the Governments of Guatemala and Honduras, the same as his predecessor. Guatemala is not a member of the Greater Republic of Central America, but Honduras is. Should this latter Government decline to receive him, he has been instructed to report this fact to his Government and await its further instructions.

A subject of large importance to our country and increasing appreciation on the part of the people is the completion of the great highway of trade between the Atlantic and Pacific known as the Nicaragua Canal. Its utility and value to American commerce is universally admitted. The commission appointed under date of July 24 last "to continue the surveys and examinations authorized by the act approved March 2, 1895," in regard to "the proper route, feasibility, and cost of construction of the Nicaragua Canal, with a view of making complete plans for the entire work of construction of such canal," is now employed in the undertaking. In the future I shall take occasion to transmit to Congress the report of this commission, making at the same time such further suggestions as may then seem advisable.

Under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1897, for the promotion of an international agreement respecting bimetallism, I appointed on the 14th day of April, 1897, Hon. EDWARD O. WOLCOTT, of Colorado, Hon. Adlai E. Stevenson, of Illinois, and Hon Charles J. Paine, of Massachusetts, as special envoys to represent the United States. They have been diligent in their efforts to secure the concurrence and cooperation of European countries in the international settlement of the question, but up to this time have not been able to secure an agreement contemplated by their mission.

The gratifying action of our great sister Republic of France in joining this country in the attempt to bring about an agreement among the principal commercial nations of Europe, whereby a fixed and relative value between gold and silver shall be secured, furnishes assurance that we are not alone among the larger nations of the world in realizing the international character of the problem and in the desire of reaching some wise and practical solution of it. The British Government has published a résumé of the steps taken jointly by the French ambassador in London and the special envoys of the United States, with whom our ambassador at London actively cooperated in the presentation of this subject to Her Majesty's Government. This will be laid before Congress.

Our special envoys have not made their final report, as further negotiations between the representatives of this Government and the Governments of other countries are pending and in contemplation. They believe that doubts which have been raised in certain quarters respecting the position of maintaining the stability of the parity between the metals and kindred questions may yet be solved by further negotiations.

Meanwhile it gives me satisfaction to state that the special envoys have already demonstrated their ability and fitness to deal with the subject, and it is to be earnestly hoped that their labors may result in an international agreement which will bring about recognition of both gold and silver as money upon such terms and with such safeguards as will secure the use of both metals upon a basis which shall work no injustice to any class of our citizens.

In order to execute as early as possible the provisions of the third and fourth sections of the revenue act approved July 24, 1897, I appointed the Hon. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, a special commissioner plenipotentiary to undertake the requisite negotiations with foreign countries desiring to avail themselves of these provisions. The negotiations are now proceeding with several Governments, both European and American. It is believed that by a careful exercise of the powers conferred by that act some grievances of our own and of other countries in our mutual trade relations may be either removed or largely alleviated, and that the volume of our commercial exchanges may be enlarged with advantage to both contracting parties.

Most desirable from every standpoint of national interest and patriotism is the effort to extend our foreign commerce. To this end our merchant marine should be improved and enlarged. We should do our full share of the carrying trade of the world. We do not do it now. We should be the laggard no longer. The inferiority of our merchant marine is justly humiliating to the national pride. The Government by every proper constitutional means should aid in making our ships familiar visitors at every commercial port of the world, thus opening up new and valuable markets to the surplus products of the farm and the factory.

The efforts which had been made during the two previous years by my predecessor to secure better protection to the fur seals in the North Pacific Ocean and Bering Sea were renewed at an early date by this Administration and have been pursued with earnestness. Upon my invitation the Governments of Japan and Russia sent delegates to Washington and an international conference was held during the months of October and November last, wherein it was unanimously agreed that under the existing regulations this species of useful animals was threatened with extinction and that an international agreement of all the interested powers was necessary for their adequate protection.

The Government of Great Britain did not see proper to be represented at this conference, but subsequently sent to Washington, as delegates, the expert commissioners of Great Britain and Canada who had during the past two years visited the Pribilof Islands, and who met in conference similar commissioners on the part of the United States. The result of this conference was an agreement on important facts connected with the condition of the seal herd, heretofore in dispute, which should place beyond controversy the duty of the Governments concerned to adopt measures without delay for the peservation and restoration of the herd. Negotiations to this end are now in progress, the result of which I hope to be able to report to Congress at an early day.

International arbitration can not be omitted from the list of subjects claiming our consideration. Events have only served to strengthen the general views on this question expressed in my inaugural address. The best sentiment of the civilized world is moving toward the settlement of differences between nations without resorting to the horrors of war. Treaties embodying these humane principles on broad lines without in any way imperiling our interests or our honor shall have my constant encouragement.

The acceptance by this Government of the invitation of the Republic of France to participate in the Universal Exposition of 1900 at Paris was immediately followed by the appointment of a special commissioner to represent the United States in the proposed exposition, with special reference to the securing of space for an adequate exhibit on behalf of the United States.

The special commissioner delayed his departure for Paris long enough to ascertain the probable demand for space by American exhibitors. His inquiries developed an almost unprecedented interest in the proposed exposition, and the information thus acquired enabled him to justify an application for a much larger allotment of space for the American section than had been reserved by the exposition authorities. The result was particularly gratifying, in view of the fact that the United States was one of the last countries to accept the invitation of France.

The reception accorded our special commissioner was most cordial, and he was given every reasonable assurance that the United States would receive a consideration commensurate with the proportions of our exhibit. The report of the special commissioner as to the magnitude and importance of the coming exposition and the great demand for space by American exhibitors supplies new arguments for a liberal and judicious appropriation by Congress to the end that an exhibit fairly representative of the industries and resources of our country may be made in an exposition which will illustrate the world's progress during the nineteenth century. That exposition is intended to be the most important and comprehensive of the long series of international exhibitions, of which our own at Chicago was a brilliant example, and it is desirable that the United States should make a worthy exhibit of American genius and skill and their unrivaled achievements in every branch of industry.

The present immediately effective force of the Navy consists of 4 battle ships of the first class, 2 of the second, and 48 other vessels, ranging from armored cruisers to torpedo boats. There are under construction 5 battle ships of the first class, 16 torpedo boats, and 1 submarine boat. No provision has yet been made for the armor of 3 of the 5 battle ships, as it has been impossible to obtain it at the price fixed by Congress. It is of great importance that Congress provide this armor, as until then the ships are of no fighting value.

The present naval force, especially in view of its increase by the ships now under construction, while not as large as that of a few other powers, is a formidable force; its vessels are the very best of each type; and with the increase that should be made to it from time to time in the future, and careful attention to keeping it in a high state of efficiency and repair, it is well adapted to the necessities of the country.

The great increase of the Navy which has taken place in recent years was justified by the requirements for national defense, and has received public approbation. The time has now arrived, however, when this increase, to which the country is committed, should, for a time, take the form of increased facilities commensurate with the increase of our naval vessels. It is an unfortunate fact that there is only one dock on the Pacific coast capable of docking our largest ships, and only one on the Atlantic coast, and that the latter has for the last six or seven months been under repair and therefore incapable of use. Immediate steps should be taken to provide three or four docks of this capacity on the Atlantic coast, at least one on the Pacific coast, and a floating dock in the Gulf. This is the recommendation of a very competent board appointed to investigate the subject. There should also be ample provision made for powder and projectiles and other munitions of war, and for an increased number of officers and enlisted men. Some additions are also necessary to our navy-yards, for the repair and care of our larger number of vessels. As there are now on the stocks five battle ships of the largest class, which can not be completed for a year or two, I concur with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy for an appropriation authorizing the construction of one battle ship for the Pacific coast, where, at present, there is only one in commission and one under construction, while on the Atlantic coast there are three in commission and four under construction; and also that several torpedo boats be authorized in connection with our general system of coast defense.

The Territory of Alaska requires the prompt and early attention of Congress. The conditions now existing demand material changes in the laws relating to the Territory. The great influx of population during the past summer and fall and the prospect of a still larger immigration in the spring will not permit us to longer neglect the extension of civil authority within the Territory or postpone the establishment of a more thorough government.

A general system of public surveys has not yet been extended to Alaska, and all entries thus far made in that District are upon special surveys. The act of Congress extending to Alaska the mining laws of the United States contained the reservation that it should not be construed to put in force the general land laws of the country. By act approved March 3, 1891, authority was given for entry of lands for town-site purposes and also for the purchase of not exceeding 160 acres then or thereafter occupied for purposes of trade and manufacture. The purpose of Congress as thus far expressed has been that only such rights should apply to that Territory as should be specifically named.

It will be seen how much remains to be done for that vast and remote and yet promising portion of our country. Special authority was given to the President by the act of Congress approved July 24, 1897, to divide that Territory into two land districts and to designate the boundaries thereof and to appoint registers and receivers of said land offices, and the President was also authorized to appoint a surveyor-general for the entire District. Pursuant to this authority, a surveyor-general and receiver have been appointed, with offices at Sitka. If in the ensuing year the conditions justify it, the additional land district authorized by law will be established, with an office at some point in the Yukon Valley. No appropriation, however, was made for this purpose, and that is now necessary to be done for the two land districts into which the Territory is to be divided.

I concur with the Secretary of War in his suggestions as to the necessity for a military force in the Territory of Alaska for the protection of persons and property. Already a small force, consisting of twenty-five men, with two officers, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Randall, of the Eighth Infantry, has been sent to St. Michael to establish a military post.

As it is to the interest of the Government to encourage the development and settlement of the country and its duty to follow up its citizens there with the benefits of legal machinery, I earnestly urge upon Congress the establishment of a system of government with such flexibility as will enable it to adjust itself to the future areas of greatest population.

The startling though possibly exaggerated reports from the Yukon River country of the probable shortage of food for the large number of people who are wintering there without the means of leaving the country are confirmed in such measure as to justify bringing the matter to the attention of Congress. Access to that country in winter can be had only by the passes from Dyea and vicinity, which is a most difficult and perhaps an impossible task. However, should these reports of the suffering of our fellow-citizens be further verified, every effort at any cost should be made to carry them relief.

For a number of years past it has been apparent that the conditions under which the Five Civilized Tribes were established in the Indian Territory under treaty provisions with the United States, with the right of self-government and the exclusion of all white persons from within their borders, have undergone so complete a change as to render the continuance of the system thus inaugurated practically impossible. The total number of the Five Civilized Tribes, as shown by the last census, is 45,494, and this number has not materially increased, while the white population is estimated at from 200,000 to 250,000, which by permission of the Indian government has settled in the Territory. The present area of the Indian Territory contains 25,694,564 acres, much of which is very fertile land. The United States citizens residing in the Territory, most of whom have gone there by invitation or with the consent of the tribal authorities, have made permanent homes for themselves. Numerous towns have been built in which from 500 to 5,000 white people now reside. Valuable residences and business houses have been erected in many of them. Large business enterprises are carried on in which vast sums of money are employed, and yet these people, who have invested their capital in the development of the productive resources of the country, are without title to the land they occupy and have no voice whatever in the government either of the nations or tribes. Thousands of their children, who were born in the Territory, are of school age, but the doors of the schools of the nations are shut against them, and what education they get is by private contribution. No provision for the protection of the life or property of these white citizens is made by the tribal governments and courts.

The Secretary of the Interior reports that leading Indians have absorbed great tracts of land to the exclusion of the common people, and government by an Indian aristocracy has been practically established, to the detriment of the people. It has been found impossible for the United States to keep its citizens out of the Territory and the executory conditions contained in the treaties with these nations have for the most part become impossible of execution. Nor has it been possible for the tribal governments to secure to each individual Indian his full enjoyment in common with other Indians of the common property of the nations. Friends of the Indians have long believed that the best interests of the Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes would be found in American citizenship, with all the rights and privileges which belong to that condition.

By section 16 of the act of March 3, 1893, the President was authorized to appoint three commissioners to enter into negotiations with the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Muscogee (or Creek), and Seminole Nations, commonly known as the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory. Briefly, the purposes of the negotiations were to be: The extinguishment of tribal titles to any lands within that Territory now held by any and all such nations or tribes, either by cession of the same or some part thereof to the United States, or by allotment and division of the same in severalty among the Indians of such nations or tribes, respectively, as may be entitled to the same, or by such other method as may be agreed upon between the several nations and tribes aforesaid, or each of them with the United States, with a view to such an adjustment upon the basis of justice and equity as may, with the consent of the said nations of Indians so far as may be necessary, be requisite and suitable to enable the ultimate creation of a State or States of the Union which shall embrace the lands within said Indian Territory.

The commission met much opposition from the beginning. The Indians were very slow to act and those in control manifested a decided disinclination to meet with favor the propositions submitted to them. A little more than three years after this organization the commission effected an agreement with the Choctaw Nation alone. The Chickasaws, however, refused to agree to its terms, and as they have a common interest with the Choctaws in the lands of said nations, the agreement with the latter nation could have no effect without the consent of the former. On April 23, 1897, the commission effected an agreement with both tribes—the Choctaws and Chickasaws. This agreement, it is understood, has been ratified by the constituted authorities of the respective tribes or nations parties thereto, and only requires ratification by Congress to make it binding.

On the 27th of September, 1897, an agreement was effected with the Creek Nation, but it is understood that the national council of said nation has refused to ratify the same. Negotiations are yet to be had with the Cherokees, the most populous of the Five Civilized Tribes, and with the Seminoles, the smallest in point of numbers and territory.

The provision in the Indian appropriation act, approved June 10, 1896, makes it the duty of the commission to investigate and determine the rights of applicants for citizenship in the Five Civilized Tribes, and to make complete census rolls of the citizens of said tribes. The commission is at present engaged in this work among the Creeks and has made appointments for taking the census of these people up to and including the 30th of the present month.

Should the agreement between the Choctaws and Chickasaws be ratified by Congress and should the other tribes fail to make an agreement with the commission, then it will be necessary that some legislation shall be had by Congress which, while just and honorable to the Indians, shall be equitable to the white people who have settled upon these lands by invitation of the tribal nations.

Hon. Henry L. Dawes, chairman of the commission, in a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, under date of October 11, 1897, says: "Individual ownership is in their (the commission's) opinion absolutely essential to any permanent improvement in present conditions, and the lack of it is the root of nearly all the evils which so grievously afflict these people. Allotment by agreement is the only possible method, unless the United States courts are clothed with the authority to apportion the lands among the citizen Indians for whose use it was originally granted."

I concur with the Secretary of the Interior that there can be no cure for the evils engendered by the perversion of these great trusts excepting by their resumption by the government which created them.

The recent prevalence of yellow fever in a number of cities and towns throughout the South has resulted in much disturbance of commerce and demonstrated the necessity of such amendments to our quarantine laws as will make the regulations of the national quarantine authorities paramount. The Secretary of the Treasury in the portion of his report relating to the operation of the Marine-Hospital Service calls attention to the defects in the present quarantine laws and recommends amendments thereto which will give the Treasury Department the requisite authority to prevent the invasion of epidemic diseases from foreign countries and, in times of emergency like that of the past summer, will add to the efficiency of the sanitary measures for the protection of the people and at the same time prevent unnecessary restriction of commerce. I concur in his recommendation.

In further effort to prevent the invasion of the United States by yellow fever the importance of the discovery of the exact cause of the disease, which up to the present time has been undetermined, is obvious, and to this end a systematic bacteriological investigation should be made. I therefore recommend that Congress authorize the appointment of a commission by the President, to consist of four expert bacteriologists, one to be selected from the medical officers of the Marine-Hospital Service, one to be appointed from civil life, one to be detailed from the medical officers of the Army, and one from the medical officers of the Navy.

The Union Pacific Railway, main line, was sold under the decree of the United States court for the district of Nebraska on the 1st and 2d of November of this year. The amount due the Government consisted of the principal of the subsidy bonds, $27,236,512, and the accrued interest thereon, $31,211,711.75, making the total indebtedness $58,448,223.75. The bid at the sale covered the first-mortgage lien and the entire mortgage claim of the Government, principal and interest.

The sale of the subsidized portion of the Kansas Pacific line, upon which the Government holds a second-mortgage lien, has been postponed at the instance of the Government to December 16, 1897. The debt of this division of the Union Pacific Railway to the Government on November 1, 1897, was the principal of the subsidy bonds, $6,303,000, and the unpaid and accrued interest thereon, $6,626,690.33, making a total of $12,929,690.33.

The sale of this road was originally advertised for November 4, but for the purpose of securing the utmost public notice of the event it was postponed until December 16, and a second advertisement of the sale was made. By the decree of the court the upset price on the sale of the Kansas Pacific will yield to the Government the sum of $2,500,000 over all prior liens, costs, and charges. If no other or better bid is made, this sum is all that the Government will receive on its claim of nearly $13,000,000. The Government has no information as to whether there will be other bidders or a better bid than the minimum amount herein stated. The question presented therefore is, whether the Government shall, under the authority given it by the act of March 3, 1887, purchase or redeem the road in the event that a bid is not made by private parties covering the entire Government claim. To qualify the Government to bid at the sales will require a deposit of $900,000, as follows: In the Government cause $500,000 and in each of the first-mortgage causes $200,000, and in the latter the deposit must be in cash. Payments at the sale are as follows: Upon the acceptance of the bid a sum which, with the amount already deposited, shall equal 15 per cent of the bid; the balance in installments of 25 per cent thirty, forty, and fifty days after the confirmation of the sale. The lien on the Kansas Pacific prior to that of the Government on the 30th July, 1897, principal and interest, amounted to $7,281,048.11. The Government, therefore, should it become the highest bidder, will have to pay the amount of the first-mortgage lien.

I believe that under the act of 1887 it has the authority to do this, and in absence of any action by Congress I shall direct the Secretary of the Treasury to make the necessary deposit as required by the court's decree to qualify as a bidder and to bid at the sale a sum which will at least equal the principal of the debt due to the Government; but suggest in order to remove all controversy that an amendment of the law be immediately passed explicitly giving such powers and appropriating in general terms whatever sum is sufficient therefor.

In so important a matter as the Government becoming the possible owner of railroad property which it perforce must conduct and operate, I feel constrained to lay before Congress these facts for its consideration and action before the consummation of the sale. It is clear to my mind that the Government should not permit the property to be sold at a price which will yield less than one-half of the principal of its debt and less than one-fifth of its entire debt, principal and interest. But whether the Government, rather than accept less than its claim, should become a bidder, and thereby the owner of the property, I submit to the Congress for action.

The Library building provided for by the act of Congress approved April 15, 1886, has been completed and opened to the public. It should be a matter of congratulation that through the foresight and munificence of Congress the nation possesses this noble treasurehouse of knowledge. It is earnestly to be hoped that, having done so much toward the cause of education, Congress will continue to develop the Library in every phase of research, to the end that it may be not only one of the most magnificent, but among the richest and most useful libraries in the world.

The important branch of our Government known as the civil service, the practical improvement of which has long been a subject of earnest discussion, has of late years received increased legislative and Executive approval. During the past few months the service has been placed upon a still firmer basis of business methods and personal merit. While the right of our veteran soldiers to reinstatement in deserving cases has been asserted, dismissals for merely political reasons have been carefully guarded against, the examinations for admittance to the service enlarged and at the same time rendered less technical and more practical, and a distinct advance has been made by giving a hearing before dismissal upon all cases where incompetency is charged or demand made for the removal of officials in any of the Departments. This order has been made to give to the accused his right to be heard, but without in any way impairing the power of removal, which should always be exercised in cases of inefficiency and incompetency, and which is one of the vital safeguards of the civil service reform system, preventing stagnation and deadwood, and keeping every employee keenly alive to the fact that the security of his tenure depends not on favor, but on his own tested and carefully watched record of service.

Much of course still remains to be accomplished before the system can be made reasonably perfect for our needs. There are places now in the classified service which ought to be exempted, and others not classified may properly be included. I shall not hesitate to exempt cases which I think have been improperly included in the classified service or include those which in my judgment will best promote the public service. The system has the approval of the people, and it will be my endeavor to uphold and extend it.

I am forced by the length of this message to omit many important references to affairs of the Government with which Congress will have to deal at the present session. They are fully discussed in the departmental reports, to all of which I invite your earnest attention.

The estimates of the expenses of the Government by the several Departments will, I am sure, have your careful scrutiny. While the Congress may not find it an easy task to reduce the expenses of the Government, it should not encourage their increase. These expenses will, in my judgment, admit of a decrease in many branches of the Government without injury to the public service. It is a commanding duty to keep the appropriations within the receipts of the Government, and thus avoid a deficit.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
December 6, 1897.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the message will be laid upon the table and printed for the use of the Senate.

DEATH OF SENATOR GEORGE.

Mr. WALTHALL. Mr. President, the painful duty devolves on me to announce the death of Hon. JAMES Z. GEORGE, late a Senator from the State of Mississippi. After a lingering illness, from which he was a constant and patient sufferer for months, he died on the 14th day of August last at Mississippi City, in the State of Mississippi.

In his death that State has lost her most useful and distinguished public servant, the Senate one of its ablest and most conspicuous members, and the masses of the people throughout the land an earnest and powerful champion and defender.

This is no fitting time for extended comment upon the character and achievements of my late colleague. Later in the session I shall ask the Senate, in pursuance of its custom, to set apart a day when tributes may be paid to his memory.

I ask the present consideration of the resolutions I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Mississippi will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JAMES Z. GEORGE, late a Senator from the State of Mississippi.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions were considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 7, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 6, 1897.

This being the day fixed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of the Congress of the United States, the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fifth Congress (having been duly organized at the extra session beginning March 15 last) met in its Hall at 12 o'clock m. for the first regular session, and was called to order by the Speaker, Hon. THOMAS B. REED, a Representative from the State of Maine.

Prayer was offered as follows by Rev. CHARLES A. BERRY, D. D., of Wolverhampton, England:

Almighty God! who dost raise up nations and men for the furtherance of Thy kingdom, we give Thee thanks for the creation of this Republic and for the continuance and growth of its strength and its wisdom and its influence. And we beseech Thee to meet with this second session of the Fifty-fifth Congress and to guide all Thy servants according to Thy will. Endow them with wisdom and grace for the rightful study and performance of the duties imposed upon them; and may they and the people they represent advance in wisdom and in power the general counsels of mankind and the particular interests of this Republic.

Let Thy Holy Spirit guide and bless him who is to preside over the discussions and deliberations of this House. May the outcome of this session be seen in the extension of the bounds of freedom and in the increase of prosperity and peace.

Wilt Thou hear us when we specially commend to Thy care and keeping the President of this great Republic. Do Thou sustain him amid the private and family sorrows which have afflicted him, and give him strength for all the duties which await his fulfillment.

And grant, we beseech Thee, that the blessings enjoyed by this nation may be shared by all nations to the furtherance and hastening of the Kingdom of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The following-named delegates from Territories also responded as present:

ARIZONA.

Marcus A. Smith.

OKLAHOMA.

James Yancy Callahan.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk reports the presence of 301 members, more than a quorum.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. COX, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The message further announced that the Vice-President had appointed as the committee under the foregoing resolution Mr. ALLISON and Mr. GORMAN.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

QUALIFICATION OF NEW MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that some members-elect are present and desire to have the oath of office administered to them.

Mr. CANNON. The Representative-elect from the Sixth district of Illinois is present, and desires to be qualified by taking the official oath.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the credentials.

The credentials of Hon. Henry Sherman Boutell, member-elect from the Sixth Congressional district of Illinois, were read.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Lawrence, elected from the First district of Massachusetts to fill a vacancy, is present and ready to take the oath of office.

The credentials of Hon. George P. Lawrence, member-elect from the First Congressional district of Massachusetts, were read.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Norton, chosen to fill a vacancy in the Sixth Congressional district of South Carolina, is present and wishes to qualify.

The credentials of Hon. James Norton, member-elect from the Sixth Congressional district of South Carolina, were read.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Griffith, elected as a Representative from the Fourth district of Indiana, is present and desires to take the oath of office.

The credentials of Hon. Francis F. Griffith, member-elect from the Fourth Congressional district of Indiana, were read.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen whose credentials have been read will please come forward, that the oath of office may be administered to them.

Mr. HURLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that Mr. Edmund H. Driggs, who was elected at the last election in the Third Congressional district of New York to succeed Mr. Wilson, resigned, be allowed to take the oath of office.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. HURLEY] state upon what grounds this request is made?

Mr. HURLEY. The canvass of the other officers chosen at the election in the city of Brooklyn is not yet completed, so that none of the certificates have yet been forwarded to the secretary of state.

The SPEAKER. There is no doubt about the election of Mr. Driggs?

Mr. HURLEY. None whatever. I have a letter of congratulation here [laughter] from the principal opponent of Mr. Driggs at the election.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Driggs is a Democrat; and as a Republican moves his admission, I am perfectly sure the proposition must be right. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HURLEY]? The Chair hears none. Mr. Driggs will please come forward, that the oath of office may be administered to him.

Mr. Boutell, Mr. Lawrence, Mr. Norton, Mr. Griffith, and Mr. Driggs were then duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

NOTIFICATION TO THE SENATE.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the adoption of the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has appeared, and that the House is ready to proceed to business.

The resolution was agreed to.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I present for immediate consideration the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed on the part of the House, to join the committee already appointed by the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may have to make.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. DINGLEY, Mr. GROSVENOR, and Mr. BAILEY as members of said committee.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report, and move its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the following privileged resolution—

"Resolved, From and after this date the House shall meet at 12 o'clock daily"—

Ask leave to report that they have had the same under consideration, and recommend that it do pass.

The report was adopted.

RECESS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the House take a recess until twenty minutes past 1 o'clock to-day.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until twenty minutes past 1 o'clock.

On reassembling, after the recess, on motion of Mr. HENDERSON, a further recess was taken until 1 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.

The recess having expired, the House (at 1 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) was called to order by the Speaker.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO WAIT UPON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the committee appointed, in connection with a similar committee from the Senate, to wait upon the President and inform him that the two Houses of Congress are in session and ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make, have attended to the duty assigned them, and the President was pleased to send to the two Houses his respectful salutation, and further to say that he would immediately communicate to Congress in writing.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the message of the President of the United States.

The message was read at length.

[For message see Senate proceedings of this date.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the adoption of the resolution I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the message of the President, and accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF ELECTION CASES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that in referring to the committees the election cases he has caused the first seven to be referred to the Committee on Elections No. 1, and the six following, which, however, include seven cases, to Committee No. 2, while the remainder have been referred to Committee No. 3, as follows:

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE WRIGHT AND SENATOR GEORGE.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, the House has already heard, by public report, of the death, at his home in North Adams, on August 14, of the late ASHLEY B. WRIGHT, Representative in this body of the First Massachusetts district. In accordance with an honored custom of this House, I will at a later time ask that an hour be set aside for paying heartfelt and well-deserved tributes to his memory.

At this time, as the Representative of the people whom he has so long served upon this floor, and as an expression of the feeling of us all, I will ask the adoption of the resolutions to be offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my painful duty to announce to the House the death of Hon. JAMES Z. GEORGE, a Senator of the United States from the State of Mississippi, who died at Mississippi City, in that State, on August 14 last.

Senator GEORGE was not only a great Senator, but a great citizen of our State, and was much honored and loved by all of our people. At some later date in the session the delegation from Mississippi will request that a day be set apart by this House that tributes to his memory may be paid by the Representatives on this floor.

At the present time I will ask the adoption of the resolutions which I now send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. ASHLEY B. WRIGHT, a member of this House from the State of Massachusetts, and of the death of the Hon. JAMES Z. GEORGE, a Senator of the United States from the State of Mississippi.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Representative WRIGHT and the late Senator GEORGE the House do now adjourn.

Ordered, That the Clerk communicate the resolutions to the Senate.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 7, 1897.

Rev. CHARLES A. BERRY, D. D., of Wolverhampton, England, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, whose blessing maketh rich and saveth from sorrow, we thank Thee for Thy continued protection to this nation and for that favor which is its life. We commend to Thy wise guardianship and instruction and leadership all who are charged with the conduct of its affairs, beseeching Thee so to direct and guide them that all their decisions may be in accordance with the eternal will and issuing fruit for the blessing of men.

We commend to Thee the President and the Vice-President of this Republic, beseeching Thee to give them grace so to fulfill their high stations and duties as to reflect honor and glory upon this people.

We beseech Thee to take into Thy safe-keeping all the interests of this people, its industries, its higher efforts for thought and truth, all that makes for its strength, for its well-being, for its welfare, giving Thee thanks that Thou hast so far led this nation into its present position of influence and leadership, and beseeching Thee that, in the years to come, from this land may emanate examples and influences for the enrichment of all mankind.

Bless all the nations of the earth. Maintain peace, we beseech Thee; and in the contentment of the peoples and in the justice of all governments may there speedily come the better time of human brotherhood the world over. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Mr. JOHN P. JONES, a Senator from the State of Nevada, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the prayer this morning be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and that will be the order.

SENATOR FROM MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. WALTHALL presented the credentials of Hernando D. Money, appointed by the governor of the State of Mississippi a Senator from that State to fill, until the next meeting of the legislature thereof, the vacancy caused by the death of James Z. George in the term ending March 3, 1899.

The credentials were read, as follows:

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye, That by virtue of the authority in me vested by the constitution and laws of the State of Mississippi, as governor, I do hereby appoint Hernando D. Money United States Senator (vice J. Z. George, deceased), State of Mississippi, and I do authorize, empower, and enjoin him, the said Hernando D. Money, to execute and fulfill the duties of said office according to law, and to have and to hold said office from the date hereof, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments thereto appertaining, until the said appointment is canceled or revoked by competent authority, or until his successor in office shall have been duly appointed, qualified, and installed in said office in accordance with the laws of the State.

In testimony whereof, I, A. J. McLaurin, governor of the State aforesaid, have caused these letters to be made patent and the great seal of the State to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand at the city of Jackson the 8th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1897.

By the governor:

[SEAL.] ANSELM J. McLAURIN.

J. L. POWER, Secretary of State.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the credentials may be again read, beginning with the words "to have and to hold said office," where the governor undertakes to define the term of the appointee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

To execute and fulfill the duties of said office according to law, and to have and to hold said office from the date hereof, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments thereto appertaining, until the said appointment is canceled or revoked by competent authority, or until his successor in office shall have been duly appointed, qualified, and installed in said office, in accordance with the laws of the State.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it will be noticed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] and other Senators that here is an attempt on the part of the executive of the State of Mississippi to define the term, to say how long his appointee shall hold, which attempt is not authorized by the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution of the United States says that "the executive may make temporary appointment until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancy;" and that should be the language of any appointment that is made by a governor, if any attempt whatever is made to define the term of the appointee.

Mr. President, this error has occurred in one or two previous credentials of Senators, to which attention has been called. There was no objection made to seating the Senators in those cases because, of course, the language used by the governor is surplusage, it is null and void; but it seems to me that attention should be called to this subject, so that hereafter the credentials may be in proper form. After the careful form for appointments of this kind which was prepared in time past by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and printed in the RECORD, there is no excuse for having such mistakes in commissions. The use of the form in this case has arisen in the exercise of a species of State's rights on the part of the State of Mississippi. The governor has taken a blank that is used to commission State officers in Mississippi and has filled it up, thinking it was good enough for the United States Senate. But whether the objections that might be made to these credentials are insisted upon or not, it appears to me that hereafter at least appointments ought to be in proper and correct form, and I trust the Senator from Mississippi will agree in that conclusion.

Mr. HOAR. And the governor also affirms the right of the State to revoke the appointment.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Massachusetts calls my attention to the fact that this commission appears to assert the right of the State of Mississippi to revoke this appointment of a Senator, thus conveying the idea which has sometimes been advanced in this Chamber that Senators are merely ambassadors from sovereign States, whereas in truth and in fact they are officers of the United States Government, and when they are once here the State has no power to revoke or cancel their appointment.

Mr. WALTHALL. Mr. President, that there are imperfections in these credentials can not be disputed, but they are more technical than substantial, I think. I submit that the credentials in substance are amply sufficient for the purpose intended. The governor derives his power of appointment from the Constitution of the United States. The credentials show that he has exercised that power. The Constitution controls the tenure of the appointee. I trust the Senator from New Hampshire will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I am not disposed to make an objection to seating this gentleman. He seems to be a very good man with very bad credentials. I entirely agree with the Senator from Mississippi in what he has said, but I shall state the importance of this matter.

I think one of the gravest dangers that under our constitutional mechanism menace the country now is that at some time or other there will be a struggle at the beginning of a Congress for political power in the Senate when the political power in the Senate has been changed by the act of the States, and by the act of the people in the Presidential office and in the House of Representatives.

We call our roll and at least one-third of the Senators are to come into office by a new authority derived either from their State legislatures in the ordinary case or from the governor. It is in the power of any Senator, certainly of any considerable number of Senators, by making objections to the title to office of particular Senators elected, to arrest that roll call when it has gone a little way, and when if it were arrested it would leave the political power in the Senate in the hands of one party, while if kept on through it would be in the hands of another party according to the public desire under the Constitution. It is of immense consequence, it seems to me, to guard against that very serious danger, that the prima facie title to office, which is the credential either indicating the election by the legislature or the appointment by the governor, should be in a form to which no exception could be taken.

The appointment of this gentleman of course is a well-known public fact, as the election by a State legislature ordinarily is, and I am perfectly willing, under the circumstances, to have him seated, not by reason of this credential, but because of my knowledge of that well-known public fact, as has happened in two or three cases before in our history.

The danger which I speak of is not a fanciful one. It is one which has existed once within my own knowledge since my service here. There was very serious doubt whether there would not be a struggle for the possession of the political power of the Senate, where one or two votes would turn it, the question coming up in exactly the way I have mentioned. There was a meeting of Republican Senators (I suppose I am betraying no secret that does any harm to state now), extending into quite a late hour of the night, and the matter was settled by their coming to the conclusion that it was not right that such a contest should be entered upon. A Senator about whose title to his seat there was a very serious question was seated upon his credential. If the credential had been like the one now before the Senate, there would have been a struggle at that time.

I hope that the Senate will before this session is over adopt some rule which shall be communicated to the secretary of every State in the Union, prescribing a form of credential both for executive appointment and for elections by State legislatures.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not object to the swearing in of Mr. Money, but I give notice that as far as I am concerned I intend hereafter to insist upon it that the credentials of Senators shall be in correct form. It is not necessary that there should be many words used. The statement that the governor appoints a certain person United States Senator is of itself almost sufficient. But if credentials are to come here with conditions and limitations and assertions in connection with the title of the appointee which are erroneous and not warranted either by State or national law or usage, I shall make objection.

Mr. WALTHALL. As there is no such struggle either pending or probable as that referred to by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], I suppose the objection will not be insisted upon, and as Hon. Mr. Money is present, I ask that the oath of office may be now administered to him.

Mr. ALLEN. Before that is done, while I do not want to detain the Senate, I do not think it is proper to permit the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] to pass unchallenged. He says that these credentials are not in proper form.

I submit that there is no established form for credentials in this body. Suppose the governor of Mississippi had said, "I hereby appoint H. D. Money to fill the vacancy in the United States Senate from the State of Mississippi occasioned by the death of Hon. James Z. George," and signed it officially and affixed the seal of the State, and it was signed by the secretary of state, would not that constitute a lawful credential for admission to this Chamber?

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, I think it would; but when the governor goes on and undertakes to define the condition under which the appointee shall occupy the office, it is not in his power to do that.

Mr. ALLEN. But I submit to the Senator from New Hampshire that the Constitution of the United States and the statute enacted in pursuance thereof by construction enter into the credential as part and parcel of that document.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is exactly what I say. And the credentials contradict the provision of the Constitution.

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose the governor of Mississippi had said, "I hereby reserve the right to revoke these credentials?"

Mr. CHANDLER. That is practically what he does say.

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose he had said, in so many words, "I hereby reserve the right to revoke these credentials and to appoint another," is there any Senator in this Chamber who would claim that that was not surplusage, and could anyone claim that that would annul the appointment made?

The truth is, there is no such thing as credentials in due form—that is, in an established form. The chief executive of every State in the Union has the right to choose his own form, and if it is apparent from the credentials he makes out and forwards to the Senate of the United States that he has made an appointment and that there is a vacancy to be filled, and that appointment or credential contains his signature and the seal of the State, we are under obligations to admit the appointee, if he is otherwise qualified. All discussion that arises about the informality of credentials is mere talk. There is no such thing as an established form, and there is but very little use in caviling about such matters.

Mr. WALTHALL. I understand that the objection is not insisted upon, and I ask that Mr. Money may now be sworn in.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to say but one word. I do not like the suggestion made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] that when a certificate of this kind comes again he is going to interpose an objection. The certificate before us contains more than the governor should have put in, but it contains absolutely all that is required. It is a perfect and complete statement to the Senate that Mr. Money has been appointed under the Constitution.

Mr. HOAR. To what?

Mr. TELLER. Appointed to the place in the Senate made vacant by the death of Mr. George.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to call his attention to the fact that it also contains the governor's statement that he appoints him to an office the title to which is revocable.

Mr. TELLER. It does not make any difference what he says about that; it has nothing to do with the appointment. Anything that conveys to the Senate sufficient intelligence to recognize the person who presents himself to be sworn in is all that is required. There have been a great many Senators sworn in with credentials very much more defective than these. In one instance a Senator was sworn in, and that, too, in a time of high political excitement, without any certificate at all, upon the knowledge that he had been elected a Senator from the State of New York. The statutes require the governor of a State to certify the election of a Senator. Does anybody here suppose that the Senate would not have the power to seat a Senator if the governor of a State should decline to make that certificate? In fact, we have had such a case before the Senate in the course of its history, where there was a controversy whether one man or another was elected and where the Senate acted without the certificate of the governor. Anything which convinces the Senate that a man has been appointed or elected is all that is required, and it is not in the province of a governor to prevent the admission of a Senator by adding something to the certificate that the statute does not authorize. If we once admit that, we will put ourselves under the control of a governor who may not be in accord with the legislative body that elects; he may have some theory that he will insert in the certificate.

Mr. President, every case that comes here should be settled on that case alone until such time as by statute we shall declare what a certificate shall contain. We have not declared it for the simple reason that if we should declare it by statute we would raise the question whether we were not bound by the statute, and then a little error of some kind might keep a State without representation here.

There is not any trouble about this matter. The certificate states that Mr. Money has been appointed, and if the governor thinks he has a right to recall the appointment, that is a question for us to determine when he attempts it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand that objection is made to the receipt of the certificate.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make one observation, with the leave of the Chair, in reply to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. He overlooks the distinction, as it seems to me, between a certificate by the executive of the act of the legislature and the case now before the Senate. The legislature chooses and the governor certifies, and undoubtedly, if the governor should refuse to certify, the choice by the legislature being proved in any other way to the satisfaction of the Senate, we would seat the party elected. But this paper is the act of appointment itself. It is not the governor's certificate of what has been done; it is a thing that the governor does, and the only thing he does. It is a written appointment.

I agree with the Senator that there is enough in it to warrant our seating Mr. Money, but the question, the doubt, the difficulty, which is a grave and a serious one, is that the governor has said, "I appoint this man under the authority of the State of Mississippi," in the first place, when he has not any authority from the State on the subject, "to an office the title to which is revocable by me in future," and it does not appear in the very act of appointment necessarily that if the office had been a different one, to wit, the true office of Senator derived under the Constitution, he may not have made this appointment. He might have said, "I am willing to appoint Mr. Money if I can get him back whenever I have a mind to, or if the State of Mississippi can get him back whenever it has a mind to, but I am not willing to appoint him if it is irrevocable."

As I said, I am in favor of seating this gentleman now; but I do think we ought to emphasize our objection to such a course, because I believe that at some time a very serious controversy will grow out of such careless and inexact credentials.

Mr. TELLER. I do not suppose the Senator from Massachusetts would be willing to admit that if the governor should make an appointment and declare he thought he had the power suggested, we would be deprived of the right of seating a Senator, or that by seating him we would admit he had that power, or that it would complicate the matter at all. He might just as well have said something else, something having no connection whatever with the office. He simply says to us that he has appointed Mr. Money. If he adds "I think I have a right to withdraw the appointment," that does not affect us at all. It does not in any way militate against the appointment.

Mr. HOAR. Let me ask the Senator from Colorado a question. Suppose the governor had said, in terms, "I appoint this gentleman to hold the office of Senator during my pleasure." Does the Senator think that would be a good credential?

Mr. TELLER. It would be credential enough for me to seat this appointee.

Mr. HOAR. That is the point exactly. It is not enough for me.

Mr. TELLER. It would be enough, because I should say the governor was either ignorant of the law or had used a blank he had meant to use in some other case, which is probably the trouble now.

Mr. WALTHALL. I ask that the oath may be now administered to Mr. Money.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no further objection, the credentials will be received and placed on the files of the Senate. Is there any objection made to the Senator appointed from Mississippi being sworn in? The Chair hears none, and the Senator appointed will advance to the Vice-President's desk and take the oath of office.

Mr. Money was escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. WALTHALL, and, the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

PARIS EXPOSITION OF 1900.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Select Committee on International Expositions, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

The act of Congress approved July 19, 1897, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for prior years, and for other purposes," provided the acceptance by the Government of the United States of the invitation extended by the Republic of France to participate in an international exposition to be held at Paris from April 15 to November 5, 1900, and authorized the President to appoint a special commissioner, with a view to securing all attainable information necessary to a full and complete understanding by Congress in regard to the participation of this Government in that exposition.

Maj. Moses P. Handy, of Chicago, was appointed such special commissioner, and I now inclose his report giving the details of his mission. It is a comprehensive and clear presentation of the situation. He recommends that an appropriation of $919,600 be granted, so that a creditable exhibit on behalf of the United States may be made. The details of this report will show how this appropriation may be profitably expended.

Besides securing a much larger amount of space than had been reserved, Major Handy obtained the gratifying assurance that the United States will be placed on a footing with the most favored nations, and "that in the installation of every important department the United States will have a location commensurate with the dignity and importance of the country, and adjoining in every case countries of the first rank."

In view of the magnitude and importance of the approaching exposition and of our standing among the nations which will be there represented, and in view also of our increased population and acknowledged progress in arts, science, and manufactures, I earnestly commend the report of Major Handy to your consideration, and trust that a liberal appropriation may be made.

Moreover, the magnificent exhibit of the French Government at Chicago in 1893, on which a million dollars were expended, should be a strong incentive to reciprocal liberality on the part of the Government of the United States, and suggests to our citizens the necessity as well as the propriety of installing at the Paris Exposition an exhibit on a par with that of the Government and people of France at Chicago, and in keeping with the scope and extent of the preparations which are being made by nearly all the important nations of the earth for their proposed exhibits in that exposition.

I suggest that the subject be given timely and favorable consideration.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 6, 1897.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances for the year 1897; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

UNION PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railway Company for the year 1897; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF FISH AND FISHERIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, showing expenditures under all appropriations for propagation of food-fishes during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1897; which was referred to the Committee on Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, submitting a full and complete account of all property belonging to the United States in his possession December 6, 1897; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the superintendent of the Library building and grounds, of the operations and proceedings in connection with the building for the Library of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF SECRETARY OF SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Senate, submitting, in obedience to law, a full and complete account of all property belonging to the United States in his possession on the 6th day of December, 1897; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Senate, transmitting, in obedience to law, a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Senate from July 1, 1896, to June 30, 1897; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REPORT OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Public Printer for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair declines to make any order as to printing the report of the Public Printer. It will be referred to the Committee on Printing. Is there any suggestion? The Chair hears none.

COURT OF CLAIMS FINDINGS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a certified copy of the findings filed by the Court of Claims in the matter of the claim of the Overton Hotel Company against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a copy of the findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of the French spoliation claim of the owner of the schooner Orange; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM presented memorials of Samson & Jacobs, of Chicago, Ill.; of Merriam, Collins & Co., of Chicago, Ill., and of the Southeastern Passenger Association, of Atlanta, Ga., remonstrating against any change being made in the present system of ticket brokerage; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER. I present a petition of the Western North Carolina Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church South, signed by a number of ministers, laymen, and representatives of that church, relative to the claim of the church for damages done to its publishing house at Nashville, Tenn., during the civil war. The petitioners pray for a direct appropriation of $288,000, the amount embraced in the claim. It is evidently a just claim and Congress should, and no doubt will, make the appropriation. The petition is signed by the ministers and many of the prominent laymen of the church. This matter is not only of great interest to the Methodists of my own State, but to the whole Methodist Episcopal Church South. Therefore I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD with the names attached, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Western North Carolina Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church South, in session at Asheville, N. C., November 18, 1897.

Hon. MARION BUTLER,
United States Senator:

The undersigned ministers, laymen, and representatives of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and as such largely interested in the welfare of its publishing house, located at Nashville, Tenn., respectfully beg to represent that the bills for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, growing out of the use and abuse of the publishing house by the United States Army during the war, have had favorable recommendations from various Senate and House committees, and that during the late extraordinary session the Senate bill to refer the claim to the Court of Claims for adjudication was passed by the Senate.

The aim of the church was originally to secure a direct appropriation, and because of a failure of the Senate committee to agree as to the amount the book agents consented to have the claim sent to the Court of Claims. Your petitioners realize, as you must, that this process will entail probably many years' delay in reaching an adjustment, and it is therefore desirable to have a direct appropriation, if it can possibly be obtained.

The affidavits on file with the Senate committee show that when the United States Army took possession of the publishing house the estimated value of the plant was $700,000, and the records of the publishing house show that when the Government returned the property in 1865 the assets, including realty, were approximately only about $200,000, thus showing a loss in the value of the property of about $500,000, largely due to its use and abuse by the United States Army during the war. When, therefore, in 1877, the agent of the publishing house agreed to accept $288,000 he, in our judgment, went as far as he was authorized to go in his endeavor to reach a settlement of the claim, and we are persuaded that any sum less than this would fail to compensate the church for the use of and injury inflicted upon the property by the United States Army.

During the extraordinary session of the Senate, we are informed, it was agreed that the Committee on Claims should prepare a bill covering claims of this nature, making direct appropriations, the claims to be included being such as had previously passed the Senate or been recommended by the Senate committee. The claim of the publishing house, therefore, is within the scope of the claims authorized by the Senate to be embodied in the general bill. We have been apprised of the service rendered by you to the church hitherto respecting the adjustment of this claim, and we therefore respectfully ask that you will take an interest in having this claim for a direct appropriation of $288,000 embraced in the general bill which is to be reported by the Senate Committee on Claims, and thus enable us to secure a prompt adjustment, without the probable long delay incident to an adjustment of our claim by the Court of Claims.

Very respectfully,

Mr. TURPIE. I present a petition of the governing committee of the Board of Trade of Indianapolis on the subject of the importance of a full representation of the United States and of our own State at the exposition to be held at Paris in 1900. I do not know that there has been any special committee appointed on this subject, and I will ask that the petition, which is very carefully prepared, be referred for the present to the Committee on Appropriations for its consideration, as I suppose the subject-matter relative to the petition will receive attention by that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition, in the absence of objection, will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2597) to correct the military record of Benjamin F. Herrington, late a private of Company H, Fourth Michigan Infantry, and a corporal of Company D, Eleventh Michigan Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2598) to pension Hannah Brazier, as the dependent mother of William Brazier, a deceased soldier; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2599) to pay a pension of $30 per month to Irvine Carman, late of the Seventy-eighth Regiment of New York Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 2600) granting a pension to Martin Luther Essick; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2601) for removal of charge of desertion standing against Peter Netz; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (S. 2602) to amend Title LXII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to national banks, and the several acts amendatory and supplemental thereto; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2603) granting a pension to Laura E. Curtis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 2604) for the relief of Allison J. Pliley, of Kansas City, Kans., late a scout in the Eighteenth Kansas Cavalry Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2605) for the relief of Eli Fox, George C. Fox, and Thomas Levick; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. THURSTON introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 2606) granting a pension to Almon Stuart, of Minden, Kearney County, Nebr. (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2607) granting a pension to Daniel F. Robertson, of Grand Island, Hall County, Nebr. (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2608) granting a pension to Hattie Blanche Sears, of Decatur, Burt County, Nebr. (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2609) granting a pension to Franklin Kersting, of Fremont, Dodge County, Nebr. (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2610) granting a pension to Oliver Domon, of North Loup, Valley County, Nebr. (with accompanying papers).

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that Order of Business 231, being the bill (S. 502) granting a pension to Rebecca P. Quint, be taken from the Calendar and indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he would not rather wait until the morning business shall have been concluded?

Mr. GALLINGER. This is in the nature of morning business, and will take but a moment.

Mr. MASON. Senators desire to introduce bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield and let the matter to which I have called attention go over until the introduction of bills shall have been concluded.

Mr. MASON. I desire to introduce a bill in regard to postal savings banks, and ask to have it referred to the usual committee.

I will state that I should like to have the RECORD show that this is the bill known as the Chicago Record bill, and that it has been indorsed by probably the largest memorial which has ever been presented to Congress—a memorial containing over 600,000 signatures from different States of the Union. I wish simply to make that statement in favor of the bill.

The bill (S. 2611) to establish a postal savings bank system and to provide for the conduct and regulation of the same was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 67) authorizing the gilding of the Statue of Liberty on the Dome of the Capitol; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 68) authorizing the appointment of a commission by the President to draft a code of laws for Alaska and to revise the act of Congress creating a civil government for the District of Alaska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KENNEY introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 69) for the relief of ex-Cadet Engineer James Edward Palmer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 70) authorizing the Secretary of War to exchange Springfield breech-loading rifles, caliber .45, of late model, now stored in any of the United States arsenals, for the Springfield breech-loading rifles, calibers .45 and .50, now in possession of the State of Illinois; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. BUTLER. I submit several amendments to the bill (S. 2369) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes, and ask that they be printed, and lie on the table, to be called up to-morrow morning. On July 13, during the last session, I introduced a bill to establish a system of postal savings banks. I also had published as a Senate document all the information I had been able to gather relative to postal savings banks in foreign countries. My bill and this Senate document have been widely circulated and considered by a large number of people in different portions of the country interested in postal savings banks, including business men, bankers, lawyers, and others. I have had a large correspondence with these men, and they have made several suggestions to improve the bill, which I have embodied in the amendments which I offer this morning. The proposition to establish a system of postal savings banks has been generally discussed by the public press of the country during the summer and fall, and has each day grown in public favor.

I give notice that, with the consent of the Senate, I shall call up the amendments to-morrow morning after the routine morning business, and submit some remarks in support of the bill and the amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be received and ordered to be printed, in the absence of objection.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO POST-OFFICE COMMITTEE.

Mr. WOLCOTT submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is authorized to employ an assistant clerk, whose compensation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR EARLE.

Mr. TILLMAN. In accordance with the usages of the Senate in regard to eulogies on deceased members, I offer a resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from South Carolina will be read.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, the 16th of January next, beginning at 2 o'clock p. m., be set apart for eulogies on the life and services of Hon. JOSEPH H. EARLE, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE HOLMAN.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that a special order be made setting aside 3 o'clock on Friday, the 17th of December, for memorial exercises in honor of Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, a deceased member of the House of Representatives from the State of Indiana.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

SURVEY OF FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. WILSON. I submit a resolution, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is directed to send to the Senate a full and complete report of the operations of the Geological Survey in carrying out the provisions of that portion of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes," approved June 4, 1897, providing for the survey of the public lands that have been or may hereafter be designated as forest reserves by Executive proclamation, under section 24 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," and including public lands adjacent thereto which may be designated for survey by the Secretary of the Interior.

SAFETY APPLIANCES ON RAILROADS.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with a list of the railroad companies of the United States that have complied with the requirements of the act of Congress, approved March 2, 1893, requiring the use of safety appliances on cars and engines; also a list of those companies which have partially complied with the requirements of said act, and a list of the companies that have taken no steps to comply with the same; also the number of persons in the employ of the railroad companies of the United States killed or injured each year during the last five years, and the number so killed or injured in the employ of each railroad company.

KANSAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer a resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it be printed and go over until to-morrow.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the President in his annual message to the Fifty-fifth Congress has made the following statements and recommendations as to the Kansas Pacific Railroad:

"The sale of the subsidized portion of the Kansas Pacific Line, upon which the Government holds a second-mortgage lien, has been postponed at the instance of the Government to December 16, 1897. The debt of this division of the Union Pacific Railway to the Government on November 1, 1897, was the principal of the subsidy bonds, $6,303,000, and the unpaid and accrued interest thereon, $6,626,690.33, making a total of $12,929,690.33.

"The sale of this road was originally advertised for November 4, but for the purpose of securing the utmost public notice of the event it was postponed until December 16, and a second advertisement of the sale was made. By the decree of the court the upset price on the sale of the Kansas Pacific will yield to the Government the sum of $2,500,000 over all prior liens, costs, and charges. If no other or better bid is made, this sum is all that the Government will receive on its claim of nearly $13,000,000. The Government has no information as to whether there will be other bidders or a better bid than the minimum amount herein stated. The question presented therefore is, Whether the Government shall, under the authority given it by the act of March 3, 1887, purchase or redeem the road in the event that a bid is not made by private parties covering the entire Government claim. To qualify the Government to bid at the sales will require a deposit of $900,000, as follows: In the Government cause $500,000 and in each of the first-mortgage causes $200,000, and in the latter the deposit must be in cash. Payments at the sale are as follows: Upon the acceptance of the bid a sum which, with the amount already deposited, shall equal 15 per cent of the bid; the balance in installments of 25 per cent thirty, forty, and fifty days after the confirmation of the sale. The lien on the Kansas Pacific prior to that of the Government on the 30th July, 1897, principal and interest, amounted to $7,231,048.11. The Government, therefore, should it become the highest bidder, will have to pay the amount of the first-mortgage lien.

"I believe that under the act of 1887 it has the authority to do this, and in absence of any action by Congress I shall direct the Secretary of the Treasury to make the necessary deposit as required by the court's decree to qualify as a bidder and to bid at the sale a sum which will at least equal the principal of the debt due to the Government; but suggest, in order to remove all controversy, that an amendment of the law be immediately passed, explicitly giving such powers and appropriating in general terms whatever sum is sufficient therefor.

"In so important a matter as the Government becoming the possible owner of railroad property which it perforce must conduct and operate, I feel constrained to lay before Congress these facts for its consideration and action before the consummation of the sale. It is clear to my mind that the Government should not permit the property to be sold at a price which will yield less than one-half of the principal of its debt and less than one-fifth of its entire debt, principal and interest. But whether the Government, rather than accept less than its claim, should become a bidder, and thereby the owner of the property, I submit to the Congress for action."

And no information having been given officially to Congress as to the authority under which such sale of the Kansas Pacific Railroad is to be made, or by what means, or under what proceedings a sale thereof has been authorized, it is impossible to proceed to consider whether any and what amendment of the act of 1887 is needed for the protection of the Government, or to pass the same immediately, as the President advises Congress to do in his message.

Resolved, That the Attorney-General is directed to send to the Senate a full statement of the authority for and the proceedings under which such sale is to be made, and of any agreement as to such proceedings or as to such sale as has been entered into by the Department of Justice with any person or any court.

Resolved, That the President is requested to obtain a postponement of such sale to such a time as will give to Congress a reasonable time to consider and act upon his recommendations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama will be printed and lie over.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. LODGE. If the morning business is closed, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 14, being Senate bill 112.

Mr. GEAR. May I ask what bill that is?

Mr. LODGE. The bill to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. GEAR. I shall object.

Mr. LODGE. It is not a matter of objecting. I make the motion to take up the bill.

Mr. GEAR. I hope that that motion will not prevail. There are, I think, matters on the Calendar of very great importance pertaining to the Central Pacific and other Pacific railroads, the bonds of which will mature on the 1st day of January proximo, and it seems to me that the time has come for this Congress to act, and act promptly. Therefore I hope the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts will not prevail. I favor the immigration bill. My objection is not designed to delay the passage of that bill in the slightest, but I think the other matter should have precedence.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that a time be fixed for the taking up of the immigration bill, as it is a very important bill, and let us proceed this afternoon for an hour or two on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it the desire of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate shall proceed this afternoon with the consideration of the bill?

Mr. LODGE. I do not desire that the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of the bill to-day. I have no wish to hurry it unduly, but I should like to have the bill made the unfinished business, so that it can be taken up at the proper time.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Chair what is the unfinished business at this time?

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that the unfinished business is a matter which has practically gone over. It is the resolution in regard to the Union Pacific Railroad, which the Senator from Iowa will remember was discussed at the last session. It directed the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of the act authorizing an investigation of the books and accounts of that railroad. The question has practically been settled. My only desire is to have the immigration bill made the unfinished business, to be taken up at such time as may seem desirable.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] desires the Senate to take up the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. So far as the pending unfinished business is concerned, I hope the Senate will by unanimous consent postpone its consideration until to-morrow. I understand the Attorney-General has some suggestions to make in regard to it which I think will be of interest, and as a matter of propriety and courtesy to him I think the Senate should postpone the consideration of it.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that, instead of making a motion and taking the sense of the Senate upon the question now, he give notice that some time to-morrow he will make the motion.

Mr. LODGE. If the immigration bill can be made the next unfinished business on the Calendar, not to take precedence of the resolution now upon the Calendar, but simply to be the next unfinished business, I shall be content.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can not have two measures as the unfinished business.

Mr. ALLISON. My colleague suggests that there is a very important matter which should be taken up.

Mr. GEAR. I will state, for the benefit of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the resolution on the Calendar looks to the settlement of the affairs of the Union Pacific, the Sioux City, and the Western Pacific railroads. The Union Pacific Railroad matter has been settled by the payment of every dollar due the Government, which I think is a great plume in the cap of the present Administration. The next thing to be taken up by Congress, in my opinion, is the proposition authorizing a settlement to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General of the matters pertaining to the other roads, the bonds of which will mature on the 1st day of January.

Then I will state in addition that to-morrow I shall introduce a bill giving the President full powers regarding the Kansas Pacific Railroad. It is a measure which looks toward the adjustment of that matter, where $13,000,000 is due to the Government.

Mr. MORGAN. The sale of the Kansas Pacific road is fixed for the 16th day of this month, and the President in his message asks Congress to provide immediately by amendment, so that he can direct the Attorney-General to buy in the road or deal with it in such manner as Congress shall desire. I am very much gratified that the President has seen proper to consult Congress about the disposal of so important a piece of property, and I wish to do what he requests us to do.

I understand the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Kansas have been invited to a conference with the Attorney-General, to receive from him a suggestion of the amendment to that measure, and they can receive it to-day and probably be prepared to report the amendment to-morrow. The resolution, which is the regular order of business before the Senate, led to a good deal of rather heated controversy just at the close of the extra session. Circumstances have interposed which make it necessary, so the President says, and I agree with him, that there shall be some legislation on the subject.

In the short space of time intervening of course the two Houses of Congress can scarcely mature and pass any bill at all, and I hope the Senate will not permit any other matter to ride down this question and put it out of its position as the regular order. We can dispose of it, fortunately, because it is the regular order, if we will devote ourselves to it and not throw it aside.

Mr. LODGE. I should be very glad to see the various Pacific railroad matters disposed of, but I think we shall probably have difficulty in disposing of them before the 16th of December. I understand from the Senator from Kansas that he is waiting for some information from the Attorney-General, and I certainly do not wish to press unduly. I therefore give notice, as the Senator from Iowa suggested, that to-morrow I will call up the immigration bill, after the unfinished business is taken up and disposed of.

Mr. GEAR. I give notice that I shall contest the motion to be made by the Senator from Massachusetts, and at the proper time, whenever he makes the motion, I shall present to the Senate for consideration a measure proposing to settle and adjust the debt due the Government by the Western and other Pacific railroads.

Mr. ALLISON. My colleague and the Senator from Massachusetts will be able to adjust the matter amicably, and in the meantime I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator from Iowa withdraw the motion temporarily?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

TWELFTH AND SUBSEQUENT CENSUSES.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 94) to provide for the Twelfth and subsequent censuses be recommitted to the Committee on the Census for further consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know that I shall object to the recommittal if I can have a word of explanation from the Senator from Montana, who is now chairman of the Committee on the Census. There ought to be immediate legislation. This is only a preliminary bill. Further legislation by Congress, upon the recommendation of the officers whose appointment is provided for by the bill, will be necessary before the work of taking the census shall begin.

If it is the intention of the Senator from Montana, the chairman of the committee, to report the bill back within a short period, I shall make no objection. Otherwise I prefer, as I had the honor of reporting the bill and am convinced of the importance of early action, that it shall remain upon the Calendar.

Mr. CARTER. As the Senator from New Hampshire will recall, immediately following the reporting of the bill to the Senate there was quite a radical change in the membership of the Committee on the Census. The present or reorganized committee will be charged with the presentation of the bill to the Senate and the work of attempting to secure its passage. Inasmuch as certain questions involved in the bill as reported will certainly lead to discussion, it seemed to the present membership of the committee a wise precaution that the bill which they are to present to the Senate should first be understood thoroughly by the members of the committee charged with its presentation. It is not intended that the proposed action shall delay at all the consideration of this measure or such a measure as may be reported at the earliest practicable date, and a meeting of the committee has been arranged for Thursday morning, when it is confidently hoped the bill may be reported back to the Senate in such form as the present committee may consider wise and expedient.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not object, under the circumstances. I will state, however, that the bill as reported by me from the committee, of which I am not now a member, provides that the census employees shall not be appointed under civil-service rules, but shall be appointed as in the case of the last census, according to the discretion of the Superintendent of the Census. After the committee as now constituted shall have passed upon that question and made its recommendation, the subject will be up for discussion in the Senate, and I have no doubt will receive considerable attention from the members of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The objection is withdrawn. Is there further objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is recommitted to the Committee on the Census.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 8, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 7, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER announced a change of reference of the bill (H. R. 2580) to dispense with proof of loyalty in certain cases—from the Committee on Pensions to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks for the adoption of the resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am also instructed by the same committee to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa offers the following resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and hereby is, authorized to have printed and bound such documents and papers for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by said committee during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON THE POST-OFFICE AND POST-ROADS.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be authorized to have printed and bound such documents for use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects that may come before it during the session of the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from California if this privilege has been heretofore accorded to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads?

Mr. LOUD. I will state to the gentleman that it has been uniformly accorded to that committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not opposed to it where the privilege has been extended to a committee, but I think we ought not to extend it.

Mr. LOUD. It has been so extended. The gentleman knows that we have appropriation bills to consider and matters in that connection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is correct. I believe this privilege has always been extended where committees have to consider appropriation bills, and I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read; as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rivers and Harbors be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by said committee during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JAMES Z. GEORGE, late a Senator from the State of Mississippi.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

C. W. COOMBS.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That C. W. Coombs be continued from November 30, 1897, as assistant Department messenger during the Fifty-fifth Congress, and be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the same compensation paid him during the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, this creates nothing new. This gentleman has held that position for many years.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, before leave is given, I should like to ask if there is not already provision for one gentleman, and if that is not sufficient for the performance of the duties indicated?

Mr. BLAND. I understand that this gentleman has occupied the position right along, but the appropriation that carried him ended on the 30th of last month, and this is simply to continue him in his position, at the same pay, from the beginning of the session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that this resolution had better go to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I spoke to the chairman of the Committee on Accounts on the matter, and was informed that they have heretofore had that matter under consideration. I do not think there is any opposition to the proposition contained in the resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. On reflection, I do not call for any reference of the resolution, as the gentleman referred to is a very useful man.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. There is no more useful man in connection with the House than this gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by the said committee during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

PARIS EXPOSITION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

The act of Congress approved July 19, 1897, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for prior years, and for other purposes," provided for the acceptance by the Government of the United States of the invitation extended by the Republic of France to participate in an international exposition to be held at Paris from April 15 to November 5, 1900, and authorized the President to appoint a special commissioner with a view to securing all attainable information necessary to a full and complete understanding by Congress in regard to the participation of this Government in that exposition.

Maj. Moses P. Handy, of Chicago, was appointed such special commissioner, and I now inclose his report giving the details of his mission. It is a comprehensive and clear presentation of the situation. He recommends that an appropriation of $919,600 be granted, so that a creditable exhibit on behalf of the United States may be made. The details of this report will show how this appropriation may be profitably expended.

Besides securing a much larger amount of space than had been reserved, Major Handy obtained the gratifying assurance that the United States will be placed on a footing with the most favored nations, and "that in the installation of every important department the United States will have a location commensurate with the dignity and importance of the country and adjoining in every case countries of the first rank."

In view of the magnitude and importance of the approaching exposition and of our standing among the nations which will be there represented, and in view also of our increased population and acknowledged progress in arts, science, and manufactures, I earnestly commend the report of Major Handy to your consideration, and trust that a liberal appropriation may be made.

Moreover, the magnificent exhibit of the French Government at Chicago in 1893, on which a million dollars were expended, should be a strong incentive to reciprocal liberality on the part of the Government of the United States and suggests to our citizens the necessity as well as the propriety of installing at the Paris Exposition an exhibit on a par with that of the Government and people of France at Chicago and in keeping with the scope and extent of the preparations which are being made by nearly all the important nations of the earth for their proposed exhibits in that exposition.

I suggest that the subject be given timely and favorable consideration.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 6, 1897.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa desires present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and hereby is, authorized to have printed such papers and documents as may be necessary for the business of said committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BUTLER, for three days, on account of death in family.

To Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

DISTRIBUTION OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report the usual resolution distributing the topics of the President's message; and I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered in the House instead of in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that the resolution which will be reported to the House be considered in the House instead of the Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the resolution, and after that the Chair will ask consent.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not recognize the right of the gentleman to have the resolution reported before the request for unanimous consent. I would have the right to object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not say that he would have the right to object to having the resolution read by the Clerk?

Mr. BAILEY. I would have the right to object until unanimous consent was given. Before unanimous consent is given, I could call for the regular order, and that would prevent the reading of the resolution. Certainly it was the practice of the other side during the last session to demand the regular order, so as to prevent the reading of resolutions sent by members on this side to the Clerk's desk to be read. In this particular case I have no objection; but I do not want to be understood as acquiescing in any ruling of the Chair that a resolution can be read as a matter of right before unanimous consent is given for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not anxious to make rulings except where required.

Mr. BAILEY. But I want that understood.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the President of the United States to the two Houses of Congress at the present session as relates to the revenue, the national finances, the public debt, the preservation of the Government credit, and to treaties affecting the revenue be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

That so much as relates to foreign affairs, the consular and diplomatic service, including appropriations therefor, together with the accompanying correspondence and documents, and to the revision of treaties other than treaties affecting the revenue be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

That so much as relates to the appropriations of the public revenue for support of the Government, as herein provided, namely, for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, for sundry civil expenses, for fortifications and coast defenses, for pensions, for the District of Columbia, and for all deficiencies, and also for the exposition at Paris in 1900, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

That so much as relates to the judiciary of the United States, to the administration of justice, and the organization of courts be referred to the Committee on Judiciary.

That so much as relates to banks and banking and the currency be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

That so much as relates to the mints of the United States and to the coinage of gold and silver bullion be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

That so much as relates to the commerce of the United States, domestic and foreign, except so far as it affects the revenue, to intercolonial railways, and the Nicaragua Canal, be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

That so much as relates to the merchant marine and fisheries be referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

That so much as relates to the military establishment and appropriations therefor be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

That so much as relates to the naval establishment and to the construction of additional vessels for the Navy, and appropriations therefor, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

That so much as relates to the post-offices and post-roads and to the carrying of the foreign mails, and appropriations therefor, be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

That so much as relates to the public domain be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

That so much as relates to the relation of the United States to the Indian tribes, and appropriations therefor, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

That so much as relates to the Territories and Alaska be referred to the Committee on Territories.

That so much as relates to the Pacific railroads be referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

That so much as relates to the civil service be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

That so much as relates to quarantine regulations and foreign immigration be referred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution in the House?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection, with the understanding that reasonable debate may be allowed. I am quite as willing to consider it in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that portion of the resolution relating to the Nicaragua Canal may be again read.

Mr. DINGLEY. That subject is referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have it read?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; the statement of the gentleman from Maine is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the portion of that resolution which refers to matters of revenue and the national banks be again read.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman desires the reading of the first paragraph of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the President of the United States to the two Houses of Congress at the present session as relates to the revenue, the national finances, the public debt, the preservation of the Government credit, and to treaties affecting the revenue, be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether that does not practically take away all duties from the Committee on Banking and Currency? I understand that a member has said that if any legislation upon those subjects takes place at this session it will come from the Ways and Means Committee. It will be remembered that at the last session the Committee on Banking and Currency was practically refused the right to bring up any measure in the House, and that when such a measure did come up, a motion was immediately made for the previous question, without allowing a moment's debate. Now, I would like to get at the exact policy of the Committee on Ways and Means in this respect, and to know whether it is intended that anything shall be left for the consideration of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and what the policy is to be in the discussion of these financial questions in this Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, has consent been given for the consideration of the resolution in the House, instead of in Committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that there is no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then, I desire simply to say that under the resolution reported, all matters relating to banking and currency are distinctly referred to the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Nevertheless, there seems to be a very decided conflict between the different parts of the resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. In what respect?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. In the phraseology relating to financial matters.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman refer to the use of the expression "national finances" in the first paragraph of the resolution?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. That language was in the resolution of two years and one year ago distributing the President's message, and it did not have the effect of interfering in any way with the jurisdiction of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I understand that all questions affecting the national finances go, under this resolution, to the Ways and Means Committee; and if that is so, what becomes of the work of the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. DINGLEY. All questions relating to banking and currency go, under this resolution, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BLAND. But the first part of the resolution, which has just been read, referring to the "national finances" includes all questions of currency, gold, silver, greenbacks, or anything else. The language covers the whole national finances.

Mr. DINGLEY. The language is precisely the same that has been used in every such resolution in the last two years.

Mr. BLAND. Well, it ought not to be in any resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I apprehend, however, that there may be ample room for construction of the language employed. I am not aware that it is the same language that has been used in previous resolutions of this character, but, whether so or not, it certainly is quite ambiguous, and if the language could be changed so as to remove the ambiguity it might save trouble hereafter. I think it is just as well to settle right now what is to be the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency in this Congress; and if there is any uncertainty in the language employed in this resolution, now is the time to correct it, so as to leave no room for loose construction.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], the question they raise depends upon the interpretation of the expression "national finances," in the first paragraph of the resolution; but under this resolution all questions relating to banking and currency are referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, so that it is plain the words "national finances" in this place can not mean "currency." The expression "national finances" is one that has been used in all resolutions of this character for several years. It was in the resolution of two years ago and it was in the resolution of one year ago. I think there has never been any doubt that all questions of banking and currency are to be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Then, Mr. Speaker, as I understand the gentleman, if a bill were introduced proposing a general revision of our banking and currency laws, he would regard it as being within the clear jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency under the language of this resolution, would he?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. With that explanation, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am personally concerned, I am satisfied.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question. Is it his opinion that a bill introduced to effectuate the financial recommendations made by the President in his message read to the House yesterday would go, under this resolution, to the Committee on Banking and Currency, or that it would go to the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman mean the recommendations relating to the redemption fund?

Mr. BAILEY. I mean a bill to carry into effect the entire recommendations of the President on the currency question.

Mr. DINGLEY. My personal opinion is that any proposed legislation relating to the redemption fund in the Treasury and the management of the Treasury funds should go to the Committee on Ways and Means under the rules of the House, although I do not know what the Speaker would hold; but that any measure relating directly to banking and currency would go to the Committee on Banking and Currency. There is nothing, however, in my judgment, in this resolution that changes in any way the rule as it exists.

Mr. BAILEY. Then does the gentleman from Maine intend to say that if there were an attempt to practically retire the greenbacks by making them, in effect and in fact, gold certificates, that measure would go to the Ways and Means Committee instead of to the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no such legislation comtemplated, so far as I know.

Mr. BAILEY. Because if that be so, the Banking and Currency Committee might as well be abolished.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I think I can make the question to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee a little more specific. The President in his message recommends legislation whereby, when the greenback is presented for redemption, it shall not be paid out again except for gold. Suppose a bill involving this principle were introduced into this House, would the gentleman from Maine construe the language of the pending resolution as authorizing the reference of that bill to the Ways and Means Committee or as requiring that it should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. DINGLEY. Do you mean strictly the redemption fund—referring to that alone?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I endeavored to make my question very specific, but I will repeat it, so that there may be no doubt about it. The President of the United States in his message recommends that legislation be passed whereby when the greenback is once presented and redeemed in gold it shall not be paid out again except for gold. Suppose a bill embodying that principle should be introduced into this House, does the gentleman think that under the language of the pending resolution that bill should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency or to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. DINGLEY. I leave the construction of the language of the resolution, which does not change the existing rule, to the Speaker of the House. I do not know what his construction might be. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, it is to avoid that very thing that I think it well enough now to have it understood distinctly just how this language is to be construed.

Mr. DINGLEY. If I may be allowed to give my own judgment as to where a resolution or bill dealing simply with the redemption fund and the accounts in the Treasury should go under the existing rules, I have no doubt that it ought to go to the Committee on Ways and Means, although I do not personally desire such reference.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Let me ask whether the recommendation of the President deals with the redemption fund within the purview of the answer the gentleman has just made?

Mr. DINGLEY. I think it does.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Now, the gentleman has indirectly answered the question. He thinks that a bill embodying the principle recommended by the President with respect to the redemption of the greenbacks should not go to the Committee on Banking and Currency, but should go to the Committee on Ways and Means. I want to ask the gentleman another question. Can he conceive of any kind of a bill more directly referring to the currency system of the country than a bill embodying the recommendation I have just stated? To what does such a bill refer if not to the currency?

Mr. DINGLEY. I think there is nothing in the resolution in that respect but what has been heretofore in previous resolutions distributing the President's message, and nothing that modifies the existing rule. As to what reference may be given in the case of any particular bill is a matter upon which I can not undertake to speak.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I only wished to draw out the gentleman's idea on the subject. The mere fact that this language has been adopted in similar resolutions passed heretofore, and which have not been the subject of contention as to construction, does not throw any light on the present construction.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Is this question open for general discussion?

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] such time as he may desire.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the issue which has been raised by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means as to the reference of matters pertaining to the currency of the country—whether to the Committee on Ways and Means or to the Committee on Banking and Currency—is precisely the issue that I proposed to raise in the remark which I first made. If there is any one proposition which more than another lies at the very foundation of the banking and currency system of this country, it is the question as to the uses and disposition of the legal-tender notes of the United States. If the Committee on Banking and Currency is not to consider that question in its effect upon the banking and currency system of the country, then there is no need of that committee holding any sessions whatever. And if it is the intention of the gentlemen so to construe the language of the resolution—and this is a question of construction, as presented by the gentleman from Indiana and myself in our appeals to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means—if the construction is to be such that a bill or resolution touching the legal-tender notes which may be introduced, or that part of the President's message which already brings the question of their treatment before us, is to be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, then the Committee on Banking and Currency is certainly shorn of a large part of the duty which this House by its rules has conferred upon it.

Now, the question immediately comes up, What shall be done with the recommendations of the President of the United States? It seems to me perfectly clear that the recommendations of the President are that the greenbacks be abolished totally, that they first be turned into gold certificates, that they be gold certificates to all intents and purposes, not only as a matter of construction, but as a matter of fact. Now, does the question whether this ought to be done properly go to the Committee on Ways and Means or to the Committee on Banking and Currency?

It will be remembered that a struggle was made in the last Congress to give to the Committee on Banking and Currency the same rights on this floor as to the introduction of its bills that were given to the other leading committees of the House. It was then suggested that this committee had to deal with questions of as much moment as those dealt with by any other committee of this House, not excepting the Committee on Ways and Means or the Committee on Appropriations, under all the circumstances.

But the House, under the leadership which it rightly follows on this side, decided that that privilege should not be given it. And we cooled our heels in the Speaker's room and about the Speaker's desk during a large part of the session, seeking the privilege of having the questions which were submitted to us brought before this House and discussed here—not in his refusal, but in the "proper time" failing to appear. And toward the close of the session we did bring in a bill for consideration in the morning hour; but the moment it appeared in this House the previous question was moved upon it, and by the sovereign will and good pleasure of this House in granting unanimous consent—and by that only—even the chairman of the committee secured the right to occupy time upon that question. Now, what that committee desires is to know whether bills which are fundamental to the questions with the consideration of which they are charged are to be referred to that committee or to the Committee on Ways and Means. And it would be exceedingly gratifying, furthermore, to know (a matter not involved in the question as now presented) whether any time whatever is to be allowed the Committee on Banking and Currency to discuss any question whatever on the floor of this House.

Mr. COX. I should like to ask the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, who I understand holds the floor, what time he proposes to allow on this question to this side of the House?

Mr. DINGLEY. As there seems to be some disposition to discuss this matter, I suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] that half an hour be controlled by him for the discussion of this question on the other side.

Mr. BAILEY. That would be all the time that this side of the House would desire to occupy, but it is possible that some gentlemen on the other side of the House might not agree with the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and might desire to be heard in opposition to the resolutions. If I could know about how much time such gentlemen would wish to occupy, and whether or not it would come out of the half hour accorded to us, it would leave me in a better position to deal with the gentleman's proposition. I have no hesitation in saying that half an hour would be as much as we on this side of the House would desire.

If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] will give me his attention for a moment, I would inquire of him how much time he desires to occupy?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I think I have covered the ground, and I do not know that I shall want more than a minute or two longer—say five minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts five minutes of the time on this side.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the half hour is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that a half hour on each side be allowed, beginning from this time, on this question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection and will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to control the thirty minutes on one side and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] on the other.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is the understanding, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have asked unanimous consent that thirty minutes be allowed on a side for debate on the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to have five minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will yield to the gentleman that much time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the arrangement.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Maine desire us to proceed?

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to have the gentleman consume at least a portion of the time.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX], the senior Democratic member of the Committee on Banking and Currency on this side of the House.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the proposition that is submitted in the resolution under discussion, when distinctly and clearly stated and understood, is simply this: That if the doctrine embodied in the message of the President of the United States to retire the greenbacks in the manner he proposes is put into the shape of law, and to reissue them only on the payment of gold, that that part of the legislation would necessarily go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

I desire to suggest to the House, however, that in a banking system I do not see how it would be possible for any committee, on that question, to frame a bill, unless it had jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the greenbacks. They are a part and a parcel of the system of banking, and if the consideration of that branch of the question is not submitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency, under the rules of the House, you would simply have that committee working upon a subject with its hands absolutely tied, while the Committee on Ways and Means is considering the most important, or, possibly, as important a question as any in our entire subject of legislation, namely, the greenback, in connection with the system of banking in this country.

Now, let us for a moment consider how a man would go about framing a bill to affect the circulation of the banks and yet have no jurisdiction whatever of the question referred to and recommended by the President. The bank notes are redeemable in greenbacks. Greenbacks are a part of the reserve fund for that purpose. Now, you legislate the greenback out of existence, and the Treasury notes—for I use general terms in connection with the matter—you legislate them all out of existence, and yet you are trying to frame a banking bill, under the rules of the House, by a committee with no jurisdiction of a subject forming the most important part of the whole question in connection with the reserve fund for the redemption of their circulation.

If the idea of the President is to be carried out, another thing must be provided for, and that is, that the circulation of the banks may be put out under the plan here advanced, namely, that their notes in circulation throughout the country must be redeemed in gold. If the notes are to be so redeemed—that is, redeemed in gold—by the banks, does it not necessarily involve the very fact that we must deal with the question of the greenbacks which you now use in the redemption of their circulation? It follows as a necessary consequence, and there is no escape from the logic of that conclusion.

Mr. Speaker, the idea seems to be to now divide up the subject in a way that, in my judgment, will result practically in the fact that there can be no possible legislation whatever upon this all-important subject. I concede the great ability of the Committee on Ways and Means. But that is not the question involved here. If the Committee on Banking and Currency have anything at all to do with the subject, I submit that you should not tie their hands so that it will be impossible for them to accomplish any legislation whatever.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if it be in order at this time, I desire to offer the following amendment to the resolution, which may possibly meet the difficulties suggested.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from Indiana wait until the debate has been closed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I understand this is satisfactory to the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to use more of the time?

Mr. BAILEY. Of course "the gentleman from Texas" desires to consume more of the time, but thought it fair to alternate in this discussion.

Mr. DINGLEY. Perhaps the gentleman had better use ten minutes of the time now.

Mr. BAILEY. I will do so, with the understanding that the gentleman then uses a portion of his time.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

[Mr. WHEELER of Alabama addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks leave to print. Is there objection?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest a limit of ten pages.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I accept the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the gentleman from Maine will not insist on that. I think the gentleman from Alabama ought to have free scope to print at this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I accept the suggestion of my colleague.

The SPEAKER. Objection is withdrawn. Is there further objection?

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Alabama spoken on this subject?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has been addressing the House for something like ten minutes.

Mr. BARRETT. I have not made my inquiry in any light spirit. I have not heard the gentleman. If he has actually addressed the House on the subject, I have no objection to his extending his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request that the gentleman from Alabama have leave to print.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the paragraph of the President's message referring to the civil service of the country is a timely declaration that it is within the scope and power of Congress to regulate the civil service. It is timely, because, as one of the outgrowths of this system, we occasionally hear that it is an insult to the President of the United States for Congress to have anything to do with the civil-service law, the civil-service regulations, or the operation of the civil service of the country. The power of this bureau, which it is now wielding with such force and such domination, all comes from a statute passed by Congress in 1883 and from an order issued by the President, either extending or limiting the operation of that law; all comes from power conferred upon him by Congress; and it is a very strange doctrine that we have at last succeeded in getting the civil service of the Government out of the reach of Congressional legislation.

So I am delighted that the President has referred this question to Congress, and I especially agree with the President when he says that "there are places in the classified service which ought to be exempt." I am delighted to go that far along the same road that the Executive is traveling upon.

I am compelled to differ with the President when he says that "the system has the approval of the people." I have tried with great fidelity to keep in touch with the tone and sentiment of the people of this country, and I believe that if you will cross the Allegheny Mountains and submit the question of the civil-service law and regulations as now administered, "Yes," and the same proposition, "No," 95 out of every 100 would vote against it. I know that it is said that the Republican who differs with this bureau is running a tilt against the Republican party; but I caution gentlemen that since the extension of the civil-service rules and operations by the edict of Grover Cleveland the First, after the people of this country had ordered him out of office, there has been no Republican declaration in favor of the upholding of that system.

The great State that I have the honor to be a resident of has denounced it in the bitterest kind of language in the resolutions adopted at their Toledo convention. So, too, with all the other States whose platforms I have read that were enacted in the year 1897; so, too, by nearly a hundred thousand the popular vote of Maryland denounced the whole scheme. All hail, Maryland, advance column of the people! So, then, we have come to——

Mr. FITZGERALD. What about the Massachusetts Republican convention?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know. Massachusetts is always a little better than the rest of us, you know. [Laughter.] So we have to meet a question that is a popular question, to be submitted to the popular voice of the people through their representatives in Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to discuss this question to-day. It would be untimely. But I want to lay down this proposition: The gentlemen on this floor who believe that this system has run riot will demand that they have an opportunity to express themselves on this floor, and that, too, by their votes. So far as I am concerned, I will not demand the repeal of this law. The argument that is used against persons occupying the position that I do is that we are "spoilsmen" and that we want to get back to the old conditions. Well, I answer that by saying that the old position was infinitely better than the new; and I challenge the friends of this system to show that the civil service of the Government is better and more efficient to-day than it was before. But if the friends of this system, that has been fraudulently denominated the "merit" system, will accept a limitation of this law to the clerical departments of this Government here in the city of Washington and will limit its operation, in addition thereto, to the postal service of the country, then those of us who believe that wrong has been done will be content; but we shall attach to that proposition certain conditions that will relieve the statute from its un-American character.

The examinations, which are to test the fitness of a man, shall be in the Department where he is appointed, and he shall not be removed except for cause, and shall have a limitation of the tenure of his office; for we will not submit that there shall be inaugurated in this country a permanent system of life tenure of official position. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask the gentleman to yield me two minutes further.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield two minutes further to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We will insist that this shall be "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people," and that no man shall be excluded by accident of birth, by misfortune of early education, if he has the fitness as well as the merit, from being a part of the executive force of the United States Government. [Applause.] We will never submit to the building up in this country of a privileged official class. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a brief paragraph from the Washington Post, faithfully describing the pains and penalties which this Government is now suffering in its attempt to fill the distinguished positions of janitor and fireman and spittoon cleaner [laughter] in three or four places under the Government. That very able and very impartial and very distinguished journal calls the attention of the people of this country to the absurdity of this position, and if there is no objection I will extend my remarks by printing this article with them.

One word further. I have stated the limitations that we ask to have put upon this civil-service law. They are reasonable. They establish the law in the very position in which its founders intended it should be established. More than these limitations we may not ask; less than these we will never accept. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the newspaper slip to which he has referred.

There was no objection.

The article is as follows:

THE MOUNTAIN AND THE MOUSE.

These are stirring times with the United States Civil Service Commission. They remind us of the days when Theodore Roosevelt used to thrill the country with the pretense of working his mind.

But even that period of excitement is as the death and silence of the frozen pole when compared to the activity which now prevails. The Commissioners arrive early and depart late, the clerks have abandoned the hour assigned for lunch and recreation, the typewriters are clicking away like mad, and pens are driven across paper with lightning speed. The chief clerk whirls continually, and the noise and bustle of the usually quiet rooms can be heard a mile away. The mail goes forth in huge sacks, the telegraph wires hum with lengthy messages, and the boards of examiners are in a high state of nervous tension.

Great things are about to happen. Five responsible and indispensable officers of the Government are about to be selected. Here they are:

A janitor at Frankfort, Ky.
A fireman at St. Louis, Mo.
A blacksmith at San Carlos, Ariz.
A cook at Colorado River Agency, Ariz.
A watchman at Paducah, Ky.

No wonder that the brows of the Civil Service Commissioners are knit with care and that the experts are puzzling their brains. No wonder that as the fateful day for the examination approaches, the friends of civil service reform await with unspeakable anxiety the success of this latest demonstration. It makes no difference with them that to secure a janitor, a fireman, a watchman, a blacksmith, and a cook the whole machinery of the Civil Service Commission must be put in motion. Circulars are carefully prepared and mailed, various blank forms are printed, examination boards are convened, and by the time the humble employee has been selected he has cost almost as much as the meager salary which the Government pays him.

Nor is the end in sight. Very soon we will have the sweeps, the towel washers, and the cuspidor cleaners brought within the all-embracing control of the Civil Service Commissioners and subjected to searching examinations. It is for this, evidently, that we pay $15,000 a year to the sacred triumvirate and maintain a costly bureau. Surely, when it is all over, and the cook, the fireman, the watchman, the blacksmith, and the janitor have been enrolled in the glorious service of the Government, the fable of the mountain and the mouse will not lack for appropriate illustration.

Curiously enough, these examinations have been fixed for the 8th day of January. It is the day on which is commemorated the battle of New Orleans, and which is reverenced by those who admire the rugged honesty and stern virtues of Andrew Jackson. From the stalwart principles of Jackson to an examination for a janitor is a far cry. It is enough to make that heroic detester of shams turn uneasily in his grave.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS].

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, I would be the last man in the world to undertake to curtail the right of the American people to be fully heard through their representatives upon so important a question as the civil service of this country, and I unite with my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], whose temperate tone this morning I very highly commend, in the hope that there will be full and ample opportunity for every member of the House who entertains any views upon the subject of civil service which he desires to express to do so.

Mr. Speaker, there are some misconceptions under which gentlemen labor which mislead them in reference to the civil service of this country. I do not question the statement of my friend from Ohio that the Congress of the United States has the right and power to legislate upon the subject of the civil service. That question has long since been determined by the fact of legislation which the Supreme Court of the United States has held to be within the competence and the constitutional power of the Congress. But the President of the United States has communicated to this House some views upon the subject of the civil service. They are very dispassionate, well-considered views, and he intimates that there has been some extension recently of the merit system in the civil service of the United States which has been honored by Executive approval. He intimates that it meets with his approbation and that he will continue to further extend it as his judgment may prompt for the betterment of the service. Now, I want to suggest to my distinguished friend from Ohio, for whom I have the very highest respect and who, I trust, will have, at the proper time, every opportunity that he covets to fully discuss this question, that I agree fully with the President's views upon this subject.

Mr. PEARSON. Do I understand the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service to say that he will give this body, by his vote, an opportunity to discuss this question of the civil service?

Mr. GROSVENOR. And to vote upon it.

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether I shall have an opportunity to give the body that privilege; but let me say——

Mr. PEARSON. I suggest that a report from the gentleman's own committee would open up such a discussion.

Mr. BROSIUS. I will say to my friend from North Carolina, who is a member of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service (and I congratulate the committee upon having him as a member), that that committee will carefully and dispassionately consider every measure that may be referred to it relating to this subject. There are already several such bills, and the committee will dispose of them as speedily as they can, and such bills as they decide to report to this House will come back, I trust, at an early day and go upon the Calendar for consideration by the House.

But, in the meantime, I want to suggest to my distinguished friend from Ohio that the President believes, with a great many very intelligent American citizens, that the whole administration of the civil-service law now upon the statute books is an Executive function, that it does not require the intervention of legislation at this time, that any errors that may have been committed by Executive action in the past can be rectified by Executive action in the future. Any improper extensions of the system or of the rules made heretofore by Executive order may be modified by Executive order in the future. The President says with great distinctness that when he discovers that any mistake has been made by previous Executive action, he will speedily correct it. So that, in the absence of any request from the executive branch of the Government, it seems to me, while I admit the power of the House in the premises, that any legislative action would be a matter of some delicacy, and might be regarded as an indignity to the President of the United States and the executive branch of the Government.

That, however, is a matter of taste which I do not care to discuss. My point is—and I state it now that my distinguished friend from Ohio may have it in mind—that the President of the United States, in my judgment, is right in believing that the Executive Departments of this Government are capable of administering the civil-service law, capable of correcting any error committed in the past, and of making any modifications in the classification that may, from the experience of the administrative officers of the Government, seem to be necessary. Therefore, while they are making no request for legislation, while they who are responsible for the administration of the civil service of the country are satisfied with the law as it stands, cognizant of the fact that they can make any corrections that experience may suggest for the betterment of the service, I agree with the President that it is better to allow the matter to remain subject to executive administration and correction than to undertake now, after the lapse of all these years, either to repeal the civil-service law or to make any material modifications in it. It is not my purpose at this time to enlarge upon the subject or to contradict the groundless statements made by illy informed persons, but merely to suggest what I regard as the better view of the subject.

Mr. STEELE. Do you not think the President is a little slow in discovering errors in the administration of the law? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not think I need answer that question.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make my acknowledgments to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. Perhaps he was not aware, when he said there was no place in this country for a body of public officials holding office for life, that he was making an almost literal quotation from the platform of the last Democratic national convention. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. That is the only good thing in your platform. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I am glad the gentleman redeems himself from the charge of total political depravity by admitting that we did one right thing.

Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I confess I was very agreeably surprised in the position taken on this question by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. I have listened to him a number of times, but did not think it possible a Democrat could ever agree with him on any position he might take. But since he has come over to our side of the question in this particular instance I want to express my appreciation of it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The gentleman from Ohio, however, does not go far enough. He says he is not in favor of repealing the law. If it is a bad law, it ought to be repealed. I have no hesitancy in confessing that I am one of those individuals who are styled, I believe, "spoilsmen." I believe that that class of our citizens who give their time, attention, and money to advance their political views, believing them to be right, ought to be rewarded. The civil-service law is the creation of a lot of political Miss Nancys. It is un-American in its methods. It was never intended to become one of the fixed institutions of this country.

An instance of the operation of this law has recently occurred in my own district, and I desire to relate it to the House. The first engineer of a locomotive engine in the United States lives in my district. He ran the first engine that was ever operated in the United States, from the city of Washington to the city of Baltimore. He was the apprentice of Sir George Stephenson, the inventor of the locomotive engine. For eighty years that man operated a locomotive engine. He is now 94 years old—as erect as an Indian—an athlete—perhaps stronger and more active than any man on this floor. In January, 1894, he was appointed engineer in charge of a stationary engine at the custom-house in Paducah. He discharged the duties of the place to the satisfaction of the officials and the public.

No complaint was lodged against him. A few days ago the custodian of that building, who has immediate supervision of this employee, was changed, and this old engineer was removed. Jealous of his reputation, he wrote to me to ascertain the cause of his removal. I went to the headquarters of the Civil Service Commission in Washington, and what do you suppose was the reason assigned for his removal? Incompetency! He was removed by the clerk of a court, who does not know the difference between a piston rod and a driving wheel. [Laughter.] A man who had been the engineer of a locomotive for eighty years removed by a man absolutely and profoundly ignorant of every detail of machinery! I made my protest against this outrage, and what was the reply? Why, that the mission of the Commissioners of the Civil Service was philanthropic; they could protest and expose, but they had no power to reinstate.

Now, what is the advantage of continuing, at great expense, an institution of this character?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I hope I may be allowed just one minute longer.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. To quote from a distinguished Republican, these carpet knights of politics, these civil-service advocates, have embodied their ideas in this system. It has grown up, fostered and protected by the officeholders and the relatives of officeholders.

Now, what we want to do is this: This House is opposed to the continuance of a Civil Service Commission. Let us be fair about it. Abolish the whole thing, and let Republicans take charge of the Government. Gentlemen on the Republican side, I want you and your party to appoint every officer in the Government, because when you do so you make decent government, good government, or the lack of it, so apparent that there will not be enough of you left in the Fifty-sixth Congress to wad a shotgun. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

One Department of the Government recently sent out 150 notices to employees, notifying them of reductions or demanding resignations. Of this number, 140 were addressed to Democrats.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish at this time to draw attention to the manner in which the civil-service law is being administered by the present Administration. I hold in my possession a letter written by the chairman of the Marblehead Democratic town committee protesting against the discrimination made against Democrats in the recent appointment of letter carriers. I will read the letter:

MARBLEHEAD, August 30, 1897.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the Democratic town committee it was voted to communicate with you in regard to the recent letter carriers' appointments in this town.

There were some 43 that took the examination, and out of that number 23 passed the requisite percentage to be on the eligible list.

Of that 23, 3 were Democrats, and stood at the highest ratings. One—a Mr. Marshall—stood at the highest percentage; passed 89 per cent; was certified by our Democratic postmaster three times, and failed to be appointed. Another stood at 84; certified three times; failed to be appointed. Four Republicans were appointed—one at 87, two points lower than Marshall; one at 84, same as the Democrat that failed, and two others at lower rating. The committee would like your investigation, if possible, as we claim the civil-service law has been violated.

Respectfully,

I. F. WILLIAMS, Chairman.
FRANK KNIGHT, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN F. FITZGERALD, Boston.

Forty-three persons took part in the examination, and of this number twenty-three passed, a Democrat by the name of Marshall leading the list, with 89 per cent. Mr. Marshall and another Democrat, who had received 84 per cent, were certified three times by the Democratic postmaster to the authorities at Washington, but neither man was appointed, the positions being given to three Republicans, who stood lower on the list.

Under the last Democratic Administration in the Boston postoffice, and I believe in every post-office in the State, both in the matter of appointment of letter carriers and clerks, those persons receiving the highest percentage were appointed.

I was very much surprised to notice that at the conclusion of Mr. GROSVENOR'S severe denunciation of civil service the applause was practically universal on the Republican side. When he stated that the State of Ohio in its platform last fall had condemned the law in the strongest terms and that the State of Maryland, which was carried by the Republican party, had decided against this reform by over 100,000 majority, his remarks were greeted by enthusiastic applause.

At the present time in the city of Boston a municipal contest is pending, and one of the chief Republican orators, Mr. Curtis Guild, is constantly attacking the Democratic party for its position on the civil-service question.

I cheerfully commend the action of the present Republican Administration in regard to the Marblehead letter-carrier case and the enthusiastic manner in which the Republicans greeted Mr. GROSVENOR'S anticivil service reform statements to my Republican colleagues from Massachusetts, so that they may inform the chief spokesman of the Republican party in the city of Boston of the error into which he has fallen.

I also wish to draw attention to the "vociferous silence" of the Massachusetts members after Mr. GROSVENOR'S violent attack. It seems to me that the great Republican party of Massachusetts should have made some response. Did its silence involve acquiescence? If not, why remain silent?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, when that piece of stupendous folly, a measure to appoint a "bimetallic commission" to rove over Europe [applause and laughter] was before the House, I had the honor to submit some brief remarks against it; and I was also one of the few members of this body who cast his vote against the adoption of that proposition. I recognized at that time the fact, which some gentlemen seem very late in recognizing, that the world moves; that silver, as a standard of value, is a thing of the past, and that all countries of high civilization believe, and necessarily believe, in a single gold standard. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] took occasion, at the time I submitted the remarks in question, to read me a political lecture and to point out my duty to my party. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] The gentleman was kind enough to call the attention of the House and country to the fact that the Republican party had declared in its national platform in favor of such a commission, and he held up his hands in holy horror at the idea that a Republican should ever have the hardihood to repudiate in this House a part of the platform of his party, although that part was a provision that no sane man would ever have put into it. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

But I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that he is himself derelict in party fidelity——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Never.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana (continuing). And I have just heard from that gentleman the most remarkable political utterances I have ever heard upon the floor of this House since I have had the honor to be a member of it. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I have listened, I say, to most remarkable expressions from the lips of the gentleman from Ohio on the subject of civil service reform. He stands opposed to his party on this question.

Mr. Speaker, that party stands pledged to civil service reform. It has declared for it in every national platform, and has declared for it in most unequivocal language at that. It has been declared for time and again by the Republican platforms in all of the various States of the Union. Benjamin Harrison, William McKinley, and all of the leading men and the most conspicuous men in the Republican party have declared for it in language of no uncertain character. It has been and is an accepted and cardinal principle of the Republican party; and the gentleman from Ohio, in making such remarks as he has made on the floor of this House, has aligned himself against his own party upon this vital topic. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Ohio, in expressing the sentiments he has uttered here to-day, deserved the rebuke so aptly administered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], when he called his attention to the fact that he was fortifying his position by quoting from the Democratic platform. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, no man can be a Republican and a spoilsman. [Applause.] Many honest men in the Democratic party favor the principle of civil service, but the party itself is committed to the spoils system, absolutely and, I fear, irrevocably. The gentleman from Ohio differs with his President, whose mouthpiece he was but a short time ago [laughter and applause], and has now gone over into the camp of the opposition.

Think of the spectacle—one to make angels weep—of the distinguished and veteran Republican, the mouthpiece of the President of the United States, fallen so low that he absolutely has gone into the embraces of the spoilsmen of the Democratic party! [Laughter.] Now, I am glad that the President of the United States differs with the gentleman from Ohio on this subject, not only because what the President says comes ex cathedra, but because I think it is founded on better sense and better logic than that employed by the gentleman. I am for the President of the United States; and while I disagree with a portion of his recent message on another subject, there is no part of it to which I yield more glad acclaim than I do to his plain and unequivocal declaration to the gentleman from Ohio and those who would follow his black political banner, that civil service reform is to have the moral support of the man who is President of seventy millions of free, intelligent, and prosperous people.

I shall not undertake to enter into a discussion of the civil-service law. I believe in its maintenance, and I thank God you have been officially notified from the White House that if you can succeed in getting through Congress, in response to the clamor of a certain class of gentlemen, a bill to repeal or impair the law, you will be met with a veto. I say now that if you expect you can attack the civil-service enactment upon this floor and that a repeal will go through with a rush, you will be sadly mistaken, for there are men here who believe, as does the President of the United States, that the civil service is in the interest of all the people, although it may not be in the interest of a few degenerate politicians. [Laughter.] I will stand by the President of the United States in his effort to maintain the civil-service law. It may have its faults. Let them be corrected. The trouble lies not in the principle of the law, but in the interpretation and construction that is being given to it by those intrusted with its administration, who are themselves spoilsmen, and who, having attempted to render the law odious by disobeying both its letter and spirit, turn around and say, "Lo and behold what the civil service has accomplished!" when the responsibility really lies at their own doors.

Now, as I said before, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to enter into any detailed argument upon the subject of the civil service at the present time. Every man knows that the spoils system degrades the public man who touches it with his hands. Every man knows that the spoils system degrades the man who undertakes to get place by virtue of it; that it closes the avenues of public preferment to the intelligent, capable man who can not get the "pull" of some local politician by giving value received in votes for him, in order to be put into the public service, whether he is qualified or not. Every man knows that just at this time, when public suffrage, the corner stone on which the fabric of free government rests, is being assailed by corruption and frauds at election, it would be worse than folly to throw back a hundred thousand offices to be fought over every four years, instead of leaving Presidential and Congressional elections to turn solely upon the great question of public principles and public honor.

I had risen to talk upon another subject, but when I heard the very distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] utter the kind of sentiments that fell from his lips, I thought it proper that I should here and now make this brief and extemporaneous reply.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have drawn, and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will offer, a resolution on the subject of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency which I think will meet with the approval of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know how much of our time we have consumed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] desires some time, and I yield five minutes to him.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Maine will offer his resolution before I proceed with my remarks, for it may modify what I have to say.

Mr. DINGLEY. When the gentleman closes, I will offer my amendment.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman give me information as to the effect of the resolution he proposes to offer?

Mr. DINGLEY. It will use the language of the rule.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will say that I am informed that the report which was submitted is proposed to be modified by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means so as to use the language of the rule, adding only a word or two about a matter necessary to be added, namely, including the reference to tariff agreed upon in commercial treaties; and if that is to be done, I have no objection to the report—it will be entirely satisfactory to me—and will yield back my time to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I will yield two or three minutes of my time to my colleague [Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, until the resolution pending was brought forward the members of this body and the country had about settled down to the belief that a doctor of finance had been found capable of treating a case which I believe we all agree sadly needs attention. There is a concurrence of opinion among men of all parties that the finances of this country are all out of joint. Thousands of times we have heard it stated that we have a dozen kinds of currency, and thousands of times we have heard it stated that the sole purpose of the party now in power in all departments of this Government is to establish the currency on a sound basis.

When both branches of the National Legislature became Republican, we had a right to expect heroic treatment and the speedy securement of the blessings which we had been told would flow from a "sound-money" system. And to whom did we look for a panacea for our ills, if not to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER]? Is he not the author of a great work upon the money question? Has he not freely admitted everywhere that he thoroughly understands it? [Laughter.] Has not the Speaker of this body distinguished him above all his fellows by placing him at the head of the committee charged with this grave responsibility? Who, then, so capable of wrestling with the problem as the gentleman from Massachusetts? Who that knows his powers can contemplate with composure this proposal to transfer consideration of financial measures to the Ways and Means Committee?

It should not be forgotten that no other Republican doctor of finance has devoted so much attention to this subject. While the gentleman from Maine was engaged in inventing a tariff bill which has already created a deficit of $40,000,000 in the revenues, the gentleman from Massachusetts was racking his brain for a remedy for financial ills. Why, then, should the gentleman from Maine desire to seize bodily the powers of the Committee on Banking and Currency and attempt to treat the patient who has been so long under the charge of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I dissent from the financial views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I insist that when a patient has been long under the care of one doctor there ought to be no change except for good and sufficient reasons. If there is any difference in the methods and views of the gentleman from Maine and others upon the Republican side and the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts it is this: Others would dodge and equivocate, while the gentleman from Massachusetts is unequivocally in favor of a gold standard and says so. He admits and says whenever he speaks or writes upon the question that it is the purpose and intention of his party to eliminate every form of currency except gold and national-bank notes. He knows that if the gold standard is to be firmly established we must follow the example of Germany and sell the silver in the Treasury as so much junk and get gold with which to redeem bank notes. He is not alone in entertaining these views, but he is almost alone in having the bravery and honesty to avow them.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from Maine that if his resolution is passed in its present shape I do not know what will be left of the Committee on Banking and Currency and the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. In times past, when resolutions of this sort were considered in the House, I made the fight that all questions relating to the coinage as well as the paper to be issued on the coinage should go to the Coinage Committee. Now, if this resolution is passed, I presume that nothing will remain for the Banking and Currency Committee except to regulate the details of the banking institutions of the country, and for the Coinage Committee to regulate the mints and the details thereof, for all questions relating to the finances of the Government are to be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have simply made this as a protest, that it may not be a precedent for the future, especially when the people of this country shall send a House here capable and competent of dealing with this question, not only upon a gold basis of the gold standard and bank notes, but upon the bimetallic system of our country, that will obviate all necessity of bond sales in the extremities of the Government in providing gold for redemption.

Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat immaterial, in the present condition of this House and the exigencies of the Administration, where these measures go. Nothing will come of them. We can see a disposition here, as well as in the President's message, to do nothing on the financial question in this Congress.

The President recommends that when greenbacks are redeemed with gold they shall not be reissued except upon the deposit of gold, but he makes the reservation that this policy shall not be adopted until the revenues of the Government are sufficient for the current expenditures, which amounts to an indefinite postponement of his proposition. I can also see in the message a difference between the President and his finance minister, for in the President's recommendations he indorses only one or two unimportant features of the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in referring to that plan he studiously avoids making any indorsement of it so far as the currency is concerned. If the President and his finance minister can come to no agreement on this question, how can it be expected that the Republican side of this House can formulate any proposition to which all its members will assent?

It is a notorious fact that the dissensions and disagreements on that side of the House upon the currency question are such that our friends on the other side are seeking to avoid any action, and, no doubt, when any proposition on that subject goes to the Ways and Means Committee it will find there its burial place, and the same is probably true as to the committees on Banking and Currency and on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. My friend from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] referred to that part of the platform of the Republican party advocating international bimetallism, that, so far as his party is concerned, that was a wholly unnecessary and futile declaration. I think he insisted rightly, for, like him, although they are not all so bold to make the proclamation, the members of that party are opposed to bimetallism whether it be brought about by independent action on our part or by the concurrent action of other nations. The President tells us that we have a commission on bimetallism still in existence, but he must presume upon the credulity and ignorance of the people of this country if he thinks that they will, for one moment, place any reliance or rest any hope upon that scheme of financial relief. So it is all wiped out. There is to be no bimetallism, no relief by the adoption of any measures that will give an ample currency to the people of this country. It is the do-nothing policy which was predicted by the Democratic party in the last campaign. The people must wait. But, Mr. Speaker, I trust they will not have to wait long, for I believe the time is near when a Congress will assemble in these Halls pledged to bimetallism and to the relief of the people of this country upon all financial questions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Has all the time upon the other side been occupied?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine if it would be agreeable to him to extend the time five minutes on each side. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] would like to have some five minutes more. [Laughter.] I now understand, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman will take another opportunity, so I yield my remaining four minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BODINE].

Mr. BODINE. Mr. Speaker, this debate has assumed somewhat extensive proportions. The question of the location of an armor plant, the currency question, and that of civil service have all been discussed by the gentlemen who have spoken. I propose to address what few remarks I shall make to the question of the civil-service law. I believe, with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], that it is vicious in its principle, that the manner in which it is administered by both political parties makes it a humbug, and that it has a tendency, to a considerable extent, to make both Democrats and Republicans, when in office, act the part of hypocrites. We do not believe in it. You do not believe in it. Why? Because we never enforce it, we never invoke it, except when we are compelled to do so by law.

When the Administration comes to exercise its appointing power as to the various officials of this Government, down to the humblest postmaster in the land, does it have a commission examine the applicants? No. When such an appointment is to be made the question is, Whom does the Republican Congressman from that district recommend, or whom does the "referee" for that district (if he is the defeated Republican candidate for Congress) recommend? These are the authorities that pass upon the eligibility of the candidates. The "coldest" position in this world is that of a Democrat interceding in the Post-Office Department to prevent the decapitation of a Democrat in office or trying to procure the appointment of a Republican postmaster whom the Democrats of his district or of the particular locality may prefer. [Laughter.] We are all opposed to this civil-service system when it comes to action.

Mr. Speaker, throughout the length and breadth of this country when the people proceed to select their officials, judicial, executive, and ministerial, in every State, in every township, in every county, in every municipality, what do they do? The two political parties put up their candidates for office, and in selecting them they apply the political test. Each party makes its nominations, and the nominees are selected and voted for on the one side because they are Republicans and on the other side because they are Democrats. Now, I want to ask this question, If that rule should prevail when all the people select their officials, why should not the same rule prevail when one man selects them?

There is but one correct solution; that of the Chicago platform.

Why, Mr. Speaker, if you apply the civil-service rule to the various gentlemen upon this floor who favor civil service so strongly, as well as to those who are opposed to it, I venture to say that not one-half of them could answer one-half of the questions which would be put by an examining board. Why, sir, a late President of the United States, it is said, did not know until some time after he was elected that the United States was not bounded on the west by the Alleghany Mountains. [Laughter.] In justice to him it may be said he knows it now. I was glad to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] not only in his indorsement of the Democratic platform upon this question, but I was still more rejoiced to hear him refer to its indorsement by that section west of the Alleghany Mountains and, he might have added, south of the Potomac. He referred to their views with approbation on the civil-service question.

Let me commend to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio a consideration of how the people west of the Alleghanies and south of the Potomac stand upon the question which you are attempting to dodge here to-day by taking it from the Committee on Banking and Currency. I give you fair notice, gentlemen, that you might as well try to bottle up Vesuvius and Ætna as to stop the utterances on the currency question of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], the chairman of that committee. [Laughter.] He has the courage of his convictions. He believes in coming here and proposing those measures which, in his judgment, are for the best interests of the country. You want to prevent him from doing that. You believe just as he believes, but you hardly think the time has come to say so. That is your purpose. But you can not bottle him. Nor can you bottle that other distinguished gentleman—the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON]. That was tried with partial success at the last session of this Congress, but I tell you he showed that he had still within him the spirit of a rebel, and he shows it yet. [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, as to the repeal of the civil-service law, as proposed by the Democratic platform and the gentleman from Ohio, let these officers hold their places for a certain length of time—as constables do, as sheriffs do, as all elected officers do—but the repeal should not be put into force immediately. The change would be too sudden. Let us postpone its operation to the year 1901, and every Democrat throughout the length and breadth of this land will say, "God bless you!" [Applause.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Has the gentleman from Texas used all the time allowed his side?

Mr. BAILEY. I judge from the motion of the Speaker's gavel that I have probably some little time left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. How much time has the gentleman from Maine?

The SPEAKER. Thirteen minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the debate which we have had has had but very little to do with the question before the House. The Committee on Ways and Means in reporting the ordinary resolution for distributing the President's message reported it in substantially the same form adopted two years ago. But one or two words were used two years ago which are not in the present rule. It is proper that the first paragraph of the resolution relating to the Committee on Ways and Means should follow the language of the rule. Hence I move the amendment which I send to the desk; and on that I move the previous question.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine, or, if he is not prepared to answer, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], whether a separate vote is desired on that portion of the resolution relating to the banking and currency question?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I think not. I think the House will unanimously accept the amendment of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well. If the gentleman from Massachusetts is willing to be abolished, I will not interpose objection. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. It is proper that the resolution should in both cases follow the language of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from Maine will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the pending resolution by striking out all the same following the words "to the revenue," in line 3, page 1, and by inserting in lieu thereof the words "and the bonded debt of the United States, and to treaties affecting the revenue, be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means."

Mr. DINGLEY. Let the other paragraph relating to the Committee on Banking and Currency stand as reported, following the language of the rule.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. That is entirely satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Upon the resolution and amendment the gentleman from Maine asks the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment of Mr. DINGLEY was agreed to and the resolution as amended was adopted.

WEDNESDAY, December 8, 1897.

The Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, we come before Thee as mourners, deploring the death of our honored friend and brother, the late senior Senator from Mississippi, a man true, just, upright, unwearied in labor and stainless in honor, endeared to a wide circle of his countrymen by his sweet and kindly and neighborly ways and the graciousness of his character. Be Thou the comfort, with Thy pity and loving-kindness, to his bereaved household, cheering them with the sense of the sympathy and affection of our Divine Lord and Saviour.

Be Thou our leader and guide, that we may so pass through things temporal that we finally lose not the things eternal. We humbly ask through Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Saviour. Amen.

Mr. THOMAS S. MARTIN, a Senator from the State of Virginia, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 884) for the relief of Mrs. Harriet D. Newson, reported it without amendment.

PROTECTION OF FUR SEALS.

Mr. DAVIS. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report a bill. I ask that it be read at length and considered at the present time.

The bill (S. 2612) prohibiting the killing of fur seals in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no citizen of the United States, nor person owing duty of obedience to the laws or the treaties of the United States, nor any person belonging to or on board of a vessel of the United States, shall kill, capture, or hunt at any time or in any manner whatever any fur seal in the waters of the Pacific Ocean north of the thirty-fifth degree of north latitude and including Bering Sea and the Sea of Okhotsk.

SEC. 2. No citizen of the United States, nor person above described in section 1, shall equip, use, or employ, or furnish aid in equipping, using, or employing, or furnish supplies to any vessel used or employed or to be used or employed in carrying on or taking part in said killing, capturing, or hunting of fur seals in said waters, nor shall any vessel of the United States be so used or employed.

SEC. 3. Every person guilty of a violation of the provisions of this act or of any regulations made thereunder shall for each offense be fined not less than $300 or more than $2,000, or imprisoned not more than six months, or both; and every vessel, its tackle, apparel, furniture, and cargo at any time used or employed in violation of this act or of the regulations made thereunder shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 4. If any vessel of the United States shall be found within the waters to which this act applies, having on board fur-seal skins, or apparatus or implements suitable for killing or taking seals, it shall be presumed that such vessel was used or employed in the killing of said seals or that said apparatus or implements were used in violation of this act, until the contrary is proved to the satisfaction of the court.

SEC. 5. Any violation of this act or of the regulations thereunder may be prosecuted either in the district court of Alaska or in any district court of the United States in California, Oregon, or Washington.

SEC. 6. This act shall not interfere with the privileges accorded to Indians dwelling on the coast of the United States under section 6 of the act of April 6, 1894, but the limitations prescribed in said act shall remain in full force.

SEC. 7. This act shall not affect in any way the killing or taking of fur seals upon the Pribilof Islands or the laws of the United States relating thereto.

SEC. 8. Any officer of the naval or Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States and any other officers duly designated by the President may search any vessel of the United States in port or on the high seas suspected of having violated or of having an intention to violate the provisions of this act and may seize such vessel and the offending officers and crew and bring them into the most accessible port of the States and Territory mentioned in section 5 of this act for trial.

SEC. 9. The importation into the United States by any person whatsoever of fur-seal skins taken in the waters mentioned in this act, whether raw, dressed, dyed, or manufactured, is hereby prohibited; and all such articles imported after this act shall take effect shall not be permitted to be exported, but shall be seized and destroyed by the proper officers of the United States.

SEC. 10. The President shall have power to make all necessary regulations to carry this act into effect.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. I should like to have the bill lie over for a day and be printed, so that it can be examined. It is a matter of great importance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

DIVISION OF SPACE IN LIBRARY ROOMS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to report a joint resolution and to ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 71) relating to the use of the rooms lately occupied by the Congressional Library in the Capitol was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That that portion of the rooms and space recently occupied by the Library of Congress in the Capitol building north of a line drawn east and west through the center of the Rotunda shall be used for such purpose as may hereafter be designated by the Senate of the United States; and that portion of such rooms and space south of said line shall be used for such purpose as may hereafter be designated by the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. QUAY. I object to the present consideration of the joint resolution. In explanation I will state that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has taken cognizance of the question, and that a meeting of that committee has been called for to-morrow morning in order to adjudicate the matter and present its views to the Senate, at which meeting the Architect of the Capitol is expected to be present with a plan for a modification to be made in the abandoned space in the Library rooms.

This is a matter, it seems to me, which is purely within the jurisdiction of that committee and not of the Committee on Rules. When the change in the structure has been made, of course the Committee on Rules will have the awarding of the committee rooms, but it is probable that a joint session of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds of the two Houses will be necessary before we arrive at a conclusion as to what action shall be taken.

Mr. ALDRICH. As the Senator from Pennsylvania has discussed the question after objecting to the present consideration of the joint resolution, probably I ought to state that it does not raise any question of jurisdiction at all. It simply cedes the jurisdiction over the part of the rooms recently occupied by the Library north of a line drawn east and west through the center of the Rotunda to the Senate of the United States, where it should be. By legislation of Congress last year it is impossible now to use any portion of the space except by order of Congress. I assume that the Senate proposes as far as it can (and I have no doubt the House of Representatives has the same opinion about it) that all parts of the respective wings of the Capitol shall be under the jurisdiction of the respective Houses.

The joint resolution simply settles that question. It does not undertake to decide the question as to whether the Committee on Rules or the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds shall recommend a plan to the Senate. I assume that nothing can be done without the action of the Senate itself, and that the question as to who may have the preliminary jurisdiction of the subject is a matter of no importance. The Committee on Rules certainly was not seeking for anything that does not belong to it. If the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had jurisdiction prior to the legislation of last year, it will have it again when this joint resolution is passed, and it can not have it until the joint resolution is passed.

Mr. QUAY. The question will be disposed of at the meeting of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to-morrow morning. It is not going to be delayed.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say a single word in reference to one point suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. I have understood that the other House propose to convert their part of the Library space into a restaurant. That can not be done so as to have a proper restaurant unless there is a furnace, a fire, in that room; and so far as that is concerned, I shall with very great reluctance agree to the placing of a furnace or any conveniences for a general restaurant in that part of the Capitol building.

Mr. HALE. The present condition comes about from action taken at the last session by Congress. The old Library rooms, occupying a large space in the center of this building, were being vacated, the books were being moved out, and a great extent of space that might be properly utilized by the two Houses was to be left free. The matter came up in the Committee on Appropriations on the question as to an appropriation for clearing out and putting the space in a condition to be occupied. The committee did not want to consider that question, thinking that it belongs to one of the other committees; but for fear that in the vacation the Supreme Court, with their library, or the Librarian, with a portion of his Library, or somebody or other would come into the space and occupy it and oust us, the committee put in a provision which has the force of law, and which I drew myself. This is the text of the provision:

The rooms and all space now occupied by the Library of Congress in the Capitol building shall not, after the removal of said Library, be occupied, either permanently or temporarily, for any purpose whatever until so ordered by Congress.

That is an act of complete suspension. Nobody has any jurisdiction over the subject at present; everybody is ousted. Congress has to act, and there has to be a joint resolution of the two Houses passed that shall give jurisdiction to somebody.

I do not see that the joint resolution itself assumes authority in any committee. It simply provides that action shall be taken by somebody.

I should hope that whoever may have the matter in charge, instead of devoting the space to a big restaurant, or to library purposes, for which we have more than amply provided in the magnificent building to the east of us, would utilize the space so that we may have light, good, airy committee rooms for committees which are now put over into some building away from the Capitol or into holes in walls that are unhealthful and dangerous, and that this Capitol, made for Congress, shall be made useful for Congress, and not for any other purpose.

Whoever takes the subject, whether it is the Committee on the Library, or the Committee on Rules, or the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I hope will consider the whole question together. Whether we ought to agree now to divide the space and let the House put a restaurant in I do not know. That is a question that ought to come up hereafter. Nothing can be done by anybody now until Congress does something first.

Mr. HAWLEY. If I understand the joint resolution correctly, it simply proposes to establish a boundary line between the rights of the two Houses. It goes no further.

Mr. QUAY. The joint resolution is really necessary to give us jurisdiction of the question, but it originates in the wrong place; it comes in here pending the consideration of the entire question by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I think it had better go over.

Mr. HOAR. The jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds over this subject was taken away by a statute last winter. The jurisdiction of the Senate over this subject was taken away by a statute last winter. The whole effect of the joint resolution as far as the north half of the space is concerned is that it gives back to the Senate and gives back to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds whatever jurisdiction they had before. How far that jurisdiction ought to extend is a matter entirely in the control of the Senate in the future. I can not see any possible harm in the joint resolution.

Mr. QUAY. I think the joint resolution had better go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and be reported in connection with whatever other proposed legislation we may have to report on the subject. I move that the joint resolution be so referred, if the Senator from Rhode Island does not object.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the joint resolution goes to the Calendar under the objection of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I give notice that to-morrow morning, whenever the Calendar is in order, I shall move to take it up and proceed with its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the joint resolution, and it will be placed on the Calendar.

POLITICAL INDEPENDENCE OF CUBA.

Mr. ALLEN. For the purpose of submitting some remarks in its support, I present and ask for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that Congress should, with all due and convenient speed, acknowledge by appropriate act the political independence of the Republic of Cuba—

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, for the seventh or eighth time I stand at my desk in this Chamber to ask for speedy and effectual Congressional recognition of the political independence of the Republic of Cuba. Notwithstanding the President has urged the contrary in his message, I would not be content or satisfied with a simple acknowledgment of the belligerent rights of the people of that island, but I would demand absolute and unconditional political liberty and a recognition of the government they themselves have formed and to whose sovereignty they owe allegiance.

The American people believe in political and religious liberty, and they are anxious to accord to others what they themselves esteem the birthright of all, and I am confident they will not be content with the course advised by this, as they were not with that pursued by the preceding Administration in withholding from Cuba that priceless blessing.

Mr. President, if you and I were permitted to pursue the course our natural inclinations and judgments would impel us to take, we would say to Spain that the Cubans having for over two years, on so many battlefields, demonstrated their valor and undying love for liberty for themselves and their posterity, they should be accorded political recognition without further temporizing, and we would enforce our views, if we had the power, with the presence of a fleet of American war ships in Cuban waters.

But, unfortunately for the advancement and elevation of the human race and for the glory of our country, we have entered an era of cold and merciless commercialism that freezes the blood of patriotism in its veins and that is willing to sacrifice human rights, the honor of women, and the lives of children, if need be, that the course of business may not be checked or that the channels of trade be not obstructed.

If I should be asked what I mean by this expression, I would answer without hesitation that the owners of Spanish bonds in this country, and American citizens owning property in Cuba that has been injured or destroyed by the insurrection, and the carrying trade and the commercial interests of the world whose business might be affected by such a step, have joined to prevent Cuban recognition, and their influence is sufficiently powerful in official circles to prevent anything further being done in the interest of those unfortunate people; and so our citizens who have hoped for speedy and definite action on the part of the Administration and of Congress will be disappointed.

I am a believer in human freedom. I do not believe God ever created one man to be the bondslave or the victim of another. The right of freedom is as universal as the human race, and wherever the rays of the sun shine they should fall on freemen, regardless of color or condition.

It may be said by some that the Cubans are incapable of self-government, but let us give them a trial before we condemn them. When the splendid men and women of 1776, by their valor and devotion to the cause of liberty, erected the standard of a republic on this continent and tore down the banner of King George and threw it into the street, all Europe said they were incapable of self-government, and that a republic would be a failure; but we can thank those men and women for statesmanship and patriotism of a high order, and for placing us in possession of a continent where true manhood and womanhood are above all other considerations and where they count for so much. Are we, the sons of such an ancestry, to become pusillanimous and contemptible in the eyes of the world by deserting the Cubans, our neighbors and friends, who have been inspired by our achievements, and who are now seeking the liberty we enjoy?

Mr. President, I am an American citizen, devoted to the welfare and progress of my country, and I would knowingly do nothing that would imperil the cause that lies so closely to my heart, for there does not run in my veins one drop of blood that is alien to the cause of liberty and freedom for the human race wherever found. I am ready to vote on the question of absolute political independence without further debate or deliberation. My mind has been formed for a long time on the course I should pursue, and I put myself in readiness to cast my vote for Cuban liberty at any moment, and I regret the shilly-shally method in dealing with this question employed by this powerful Government.

The President of the United States, after devoting much time to the Cuban question in his message, says:

* * * I regard the recognition of the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents as now unwise and therefore inadmissible. Should that step hereafter be deemed wise as a measure of right and duty, the Executive will take it.

This will be a great disappointment to members of the Republican party throughout the United States, for the platform of 1896, on which Mr. McKinley was elected, made this emphatic declaration:

From the hour of achieving their own independence the people of the United States have regarded with sympathy the struggles of other American people to free themselves from European domination. We watch with deep and abiding interest the heroic battle of the Cuban patriots against cruelty and oppression, and our best hopes go out for the full success of their determined contest for liberty.

The Government of Spain, having lost control of Cuba and being unable to protect the property or lives of resident American citizens or to comply with its treaty obligations, we believe that the Government of the United States should actively use its influence and good offices to restore peace and give independence to the island.

There is no uncertainty in the doctrine here announced. It is emphatically declared that Spain has lost control of Cuba and that she is unable to protect the property or lives of resident American citizens or to comply with treaty obligations, and that the Republican party believes the Government of the United States should actively use its influence and good offices to restore peace and "give independence to that island."

Mr. President, I call particular attention to the words "give independence to that island." The Republican party was not satisfied with merely recognizing the belligerent rights of the Cubans. It wanted a republic, and so it spoke of political independence.

Mr. McKinley adopted this doctrine by his letter of acceptance and in becoming the candidate of his party for the Presidency. He was therefore, in good faith, under obligation to carry out the pledge made to the people. I believe the President is a conscientious man, and desires to deal justly with all interests and all people, but I believe as well that he is the victim of circumstances over which he has no control, and which rob him in a large measure of that freedom and independence that should characterize the Chief Executive of a mighty nation.

Mr. President, the attitude of the President, in his annual message, will be a disappointment to the seventy-three millions of our people.

The Democratic party declared in 1896 that—

We extend our sympathy to the people of Cuba in their heroic struggle for liberty and independence.

That is a clear declaration looking to the ultimate political independence of the Cuban people. Sympathy, in a political sense, does not mean an emotion of the breast merely. It means active aid; the employment of those efficient agencies which will assist in the accomplishment of the desired result.

The Populist party declared in 1896 that—

We tender to the patriotic people of Cuba our deepest sympathy in their heroic struggle for political freedom and independence, and we believe the time has come when the United States, the greatest Republic of the world, should recognize that Cuba is, and of right ought to be, a free and independent state.

There is no uncertainty in that statement. Cuba is, and of right ought to be, a free and independent state. The declaration accords with the wishes of the American people. It is in harmony with the promptings of every heart in the nation. It is in line with our settled policy, and meets the requirements of an elevated humanity.

And so, Mr. President, as I favor the political liberty of Cuba, I am a strong sympathizer with the struggles of the Irish people to liberate themselves from the galling yoke of British tyranny, and as I would hail with delight the independence of that people and the restoration of home rule, so I would hail the independence of the Cubans.

The President seems to have been lulled to sleep by the declaration of Spain that she will give Cuba a semipolitical existence, such as Canada has; but has the President and his party forgotten that Spain made such promises under the Administration of President Grant, only to violate them in a shameful manner when Cuba had laid down her arms? Sir, I have no faith in Spanish promises, or in her disposition to carry out her pledges in good faith.

Mr. President, we erect shafts of polished marble to commemorate great epochs in our national history, or a triumph in some important battle; we sing pæans of praise to those whose services have been given to the cause of freedom and humanity, and we accept the declaration that the highest possible attainments can not be reached by man unless he enjoys enlightened and just liberty. We have declared our unchangeable devotion to the doctrine that this continent shall be free soil and be trodden alone by freemen, and yet we sustain the hold of a tottering and cruel monarchy, the institutions of which are passing into decay and which is satisfied only when inflicting on a civilized people, struggling for their political independence, the most cruel torture. In his own good time, God will call us to account for such rank hypocrisy and such a flagrant neglect of public duty.

Let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

BERNARD CAMPBELL.

Mr. KYLE. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas one Bernard Campbell, an American citizen, while employed as marine engineer, in the year 1889, was cruelly and inhumanly treated while at Cape Haitien, Island of Haiti, by an attempt to force him on board a Haitian man-of-war and into the Haitian service: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations is directed to communicate with the State Department, and report to the Senate at an early day what progress has been made toward the settlement of said Campbell's claim against the Haitian Government.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, I do not think there will be objection to the present consideration of this resolution, nor do I wish to take up the time of the Senate at this hour to discuss it. I merely wish to call attention to the American way of protecting citizens abroad and to the very striking contrast between the United States and Germany in this respect. For the past few days our papers have given details of Germany's peremptory demand upon Haiti for indemnity because of the arrest and imprisonment of Herr Lueders, one of her subjects. Only a very short time has elapsed since the alleged insult to Germany, but the ultimatum was given. The Washington Post of yesterday contains the following as representing in specific terms Germany's demands:

ULTIMATUM TO HAITI—GIVEN EIGHT HOURS TO GRANT THE GERMAN DEMANDS—REPUBLIC SAID TO HAVE YIELDED—TWO CRUISERS ENTERED PORT AU PRINCE MONDAY MORNING AND PRESENTED THE KAISER'S REQUEST—LOCAL POPULATION IN A STATE OF GREAT EXCITEMENT, AND STRONG FEELING IS DISPLAYED AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT—TERMS OF THE GERMAN ULTIMATUM.

NATURE OF GERMANY'S DEMANDS.

6 p. m.—The population of the city late this afternoon, when this cablegram is sent, appears calm, and the present indications seem to confirm the supposition, cabled earlier to-day, that the Government will accept the conditions imposed by Germany so far as money indemnity is concerned, and it is also probable that, yielding to superior force and in order to avoid internal troubles, the Government will accept the other conditions. The exact nature of Germany's demands on Haiti is as yet somewhat in doubt, but it is understood that the German Government asks:

"First. An indemnity of $20,000 for Herr Lueders

"Second. The promise that Herr Lueders may return to Haiti and there sojourn without danger of any kind.

"Third. A letter to the German Government, in which Haiti will express apology for the proceedings toward the German Government in the whole transaction.

"Fourth. That the President of Haiti shall graciously receive the German chargé d'affaires at Port au Prince."

It is this fourth demand to which the most serious exception has been taken by the Haitian Government, as affecting Haiti's honor and involving a deep humiliation, for it was Count Schwerin, the German chargé d'affaires at Port au Prince, who went before President Simon Sam and rudely submitted the demand for indemnity and apology.

These demands, Mr. President, have been acceded to. I do not recite this incident to signify my approval of Germany's method of settling claims, but to express my very emphatic disapproval of the American method. Here is an American citizen, Mr. Bernard Campbell, who, by an attempt to force him on board a Haitian man-of-war in 1889, received bodily injuries from which he can never recover. He is to-day a physical wreck, poverty stricken, and unable to do a day's work; but, though his claim has, by action of the State Department, been before the Haitian Government for four or five years, and though there is no question as to the rightfulness of his claim, the policy of our Government will allow the man to starve before he recovers a cent. I have here letters from Secretary of State Uhl, Secretary Olney, and others, which read like the one I now present as a sample:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 7, 1895.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 4th instant concerning your claim against the Government of Haiti. In reply I have to say that the Department has not received an answer to the representations which our minister at Port au Prince was directed to make to the Government in regard to this claim.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

EDWIN F. UHL, Acting Secretary.

BERNARD CAMPBELL, Esq.,
Little Berry, Bergen County, N. J.

The status of the claim is exactly the same to-day, Mr. President, and I trust the Committee on Foreign Relations will investigate and report at an early day as to the prospect of settlement.

Mr. HOAR. I think the resolution should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Does the Senator object to that reference?

Mr. KYLE. I have no objection, provided the resolution can be reported back at an early day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the absence of objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, transmitted to the Senate resolutions on the death of Hon. ASHLEY B. WRIGHT, late a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, and Hon. JAMES Z. GEORGE, late a Senator from the State of Mississippi.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE WRIGHT.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolutions just received from the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has learned with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. ASHLEY B. WRIGHT, a member of this House from the State of Massachusetts, and of the death of the Hon. JAMES Z. GEORGE, a Senator of the United States from the State of Mississippi.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Representative WRIGHT and the late Senator GEORGE the House do now adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I present the resolutions which I send to the desk, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. ASHLEY B. WRIGHT, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions were considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 9, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 8, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to ask unanimous consent that that committee may have the privilege of sitting during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 4303) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire it to be understood that all points of order are reserved.

The SPEAKER. The bill will go to the Committee of the Whole, with the points of order reserved.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I wish to give notice to the House that immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow I will call up this bill for consideration.

BUSINESS OF THE ELECTION COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask consent for the immediate passage of the resolutions I send to the desk. They are the formal resolutions ordinarily adopted from the Committee on Elections of the House.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 2 be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I ask also the adoption of the second resolution sent up.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 2 be authorized to have printed and bound such documents, for the use of said committee, as it may deem necessary in connection with business that may come before it during the sessions of the Fifty-fifth Congress.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution I send up.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 1, or such subcommittee thereof as may be designated, shall have leave to sit during the sessions of the House during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the resolution is to authorize a subcommittee to sit during the sessions of the House. I do not think that is the usual order made in such cases. The ordinary resolution provides that the committee itself shall have that privilege, but it does not extend to the subcommittees.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. If the gentleman from Georgia objects, I will strike out that feature of the resolution. But while I have no objection to striking it out, I know of no reason why the subcommittee should not sit if we shall appoint a subcommittee.

Mr. CANNON. It can sit under the general leave.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. This is the usual form where a subcommittee is appointed. I have followed the precedents.

Mr. BAILEY. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio, in view of the fact that there are such few contests and three committees to consider them, whether he expects there will be any subcommittee appointed?

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. No; but the committee may change its mind, and therefore took occasion to arrange in advance if it shall be found necessary.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like the gentleman from Ohio to be at all the sessions of that committee, I will take the liberty of saying.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have no objection to the usual resolution, and will say to the gentleman from Ohio that if it be necessary at any time hereafter to appoint a subcommittee for the performance of the duties of the committee, I will aid him as much as possible in procuring the adoption of such a resolution. But, until the necessity arises, I hope he will strike out that feature.

Mr. CANNON. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, while I am not at all interested in the request he makes, that my understanding is that leave to a committee of the House to sit during the sessions of the House includes such subcommittees as may be provided for the necessary transaction of their business.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, with such high authority to back me, I will consent to strike out that part of the resolution relating to the subcommittee, and let it go as applying to the full committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution as modified by the gentleman from Ohio?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, and agreed to.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 1 be authorized to have printed and bound such documents and papers, for the use of said committee, as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects that may come before it during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution reported by the Clerk?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a brief memorial of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorial of the American Federation of Labor. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. GARDNER. I think, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Tennessee understood the circumstances, he would withdraw his objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object because I do not know what this is, and I do not want to know because it does not belong in the RECORD. We ought to keep the RECORD clear of everything that does not belong in it; and I can assure my friend that if he wants to bury his memorial where it will never be found, he can not find a better burying ground than the RECORD.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the Committee on Appropriations have given notice that they will not be prepared to call up the pension appropriation bill until morning, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will withhold that motion——

Mr. DINGLEY. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, my attention is called to a mistake in the Journal, and although it has been approved, I desire to have it corrected. The Journal read this morning records my colleague [Mr. HENRY of Texas] as having appeared yesterday. He was here, and the roll call shows that he answered to his name, on the first day. I should like to have the statement in the Journal this morning eliminated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the error was committed, and that correction ought to be made. With the consent of the House, the Chair will direct that the correction be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. I now renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation as made by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the office of register of wills—to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Thomas H. Brinegar vs. The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copies of the journals of the legislative bodies of Oklahoma—to the Committee on the Territories.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting to the House the report of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua (the original report does not accompany this letter, but has been sent to the Senate)—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting additional estimates for the service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Shag Rocks, Arch Rock, Blossom Rock, Two Mission Rocks, and Anita Rock, San Francisco Harbor, California—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of the Arkansas River at Dardanelle, Ark.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Siletz River, bar, and entrance—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Herring River, Massachusetts—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Santiam River, Oregon—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a statement of the judgments rendered by the court for the year ending December 4, 1897, the amounts thereof, etc.—to the Committee on Appropriations.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a request for the passage of a joint resolution transferring the sum of $85,000 from the unexpended balance of the appropriation for pay of the Army for 1896 to the same appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of dam in the upper Allegheny River, near Corydon, Pa., and of all the dams in the Conewango Creek and the rapids, at or near Waterboro, in the Conewango Creek—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Alsea River, Oregon—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Yaquina River, Oregon—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department building, submitting an estimate of appropriation for the erection of proper sheds for the protection of bicycles—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 9, 1897.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORT OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a list of judgments rendered by that court and the amounts thereof for the year ended December 4, 1897; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF THE LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Librarian of Congress for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1897; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HALE. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to present and have referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations a memorial from 21,269 native citizens of Hawaii, remonstrating against annexation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the memorial will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COCKRELL. What was the request?

Mr. HOAR. The request was for unanimous consent. It is a memorial which under our rules, coming from citizens of another country, would not ordinarily be received, but under the peculiar circumstances I supposed the Senate would receive it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PENROSE presented a petition of the Citizens' Republican Association of the Thirtieth Ward of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that the civil-service rules be honestly and honorably applied; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented a petition of 29 citizens of Lower Merion, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation restricting immigration; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Young Men's Christian Association of Pittston, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation raising the age of protection for girls to 18 years in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Young Men's Christian Association of Pittston, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in all Government buildings; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented a petition of the Young Men's Christian Association of Pittston, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation substituting voluntary arbitration for railway strikes; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Young Men's Christian Association of Pittston, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation prohibiting in the District of Columbia and the Territories kinetoscope reproductions of pugilistic encounters, and also the interstate transportation of materials of the same; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Young Men's Christian Association of Pittston, Pa., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Young Men's Christian Association of Pittston, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation prohibiting interstate gambling by telegraph, telephone, or otherwise; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HALE. I present the petition of Isaac A. Loos, professor of political science, State University of Iowa, and sundry other petitions of professors in colleges and gentlemen of literary and scientific attainments, praying for the publication of a new edition of the Charters, Constitutions, and Organic Laws of the United States. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Portland, Me., praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of a dry dock at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DANIEL presented a petition of sundry citizens of Prince Edward County, Va., praying for the enactment of legislation granting a pension to Miss Martha S. Morgan and Miss Sarah D. Morgan, daughters of John G. Morgan, a soldier in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. THURSTON presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and of the Young Women's Christian Temperance Union of Aurora, Nebr., praying for the enactment of legislation raising the age of protection for girls to 18 years in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented petitions of the Congregational Church Society of Aurora; of members of the Presbyterian Church of Aurora, and of the United Brethren and Baptist church societies of Aurora, all in the State of Nebraska, praying for the enactment of legislation prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol building and grounds; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them adversely, and moved that they be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to:

A bill (S. 1113) to establish a marine hospital at Sabine Pass, Tex.;

A bill (S. 1246) to change the boundaries of the collection district of Galveston, Tex., and make Sabine Pass a port of entry, and create a new collection district; and

A bill (S. 1874) to regulate the importation of gunpowder, nitroglycerin, and other explosive substances.

Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on the Census, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 94) to provide for the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, reported it with amendments.

Mr MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 67) authorizing the gilding of the Statue of Liberty on the Dome of the Capitol, reported it without amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1601) to remit the time penalties on the light-house tender Rose, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2294) to provide an American register for the steamer Jacksonville, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

KANSAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. GEAR, from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, reported the following resolutions; which were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas the President, in his annual message to the Fifty-fifth Congress, has made the following statements and recommendations as to the Kansas Pacific Railroad:

"The sale of the subsidized portion of the Kansas Pacific Line, upon which the Government holds a second-mortgage lien, has been postponed at the instance of the Government to December 16, 1897. The debt of this division of the Union Pacific Railway to the Government on November 1, 1897, was the principal of the subsidy bonds, $6,303,000, and the unpaid and accrued interest thereon, $6,626,690.33, making a total of $12,929,690.33.

"The sale of this road was originally advertised for November 4, but for the purpose of securing the utmost public notice of the event it was postponed until December 16, and a second advertisement of the sale was made. By the decree of the court the upset price on the sale of the Kansas Pacific will yield to the Government the sum of $2,500,000 over all prior liens, costs, and charges. If no other or better bid is made, this sum is all that the Government will receive on its claim of nearly $13,000,000. The Government has no information as to whether there will be other bidders or a better bid than the minimum amount herein stated. The question presented, therefore, is whether the Government shall, under authority given it by the act of March 3, 1887, purchase or redeem the road in the event that a bid is not made by private parties covering the entire Government claim. To qualify the Government to bid at the sales will require a deposit of $900,000, as follows: In the Government cause $500,000 and in each of the first-mortgage causes $200,000, and in the latter the deposit must be in cash. Payments at the sale are as follows: Upon the acceptance of the bid a sum which, with the amount already deposited, shall equal 15 per cent of the bid; the balance in installments of 25 per cent thirty, forty, and fifty days after the confirmation of the sale. The lien on the Kansas Pacific prior to that of the Government on the 30th July, 1897, principal and interest, amounted to $7,281,048.11. The Government, therefore, should it become the highest bidder, will have to pay the amount of the first-mortgage lien.

"I believe that under the act of 1887 it has the authority to do this, and in absence of any action by Congress I shall direct the Secretary of the Treasury to make the necessary deposit as required by the court's decree to qualify as a bidder and to bid at the sale a sum which will at least equal the principal of the debt due to the Government; but suggest in order to remove all controversy that an amendment of the law be immediately passed explicitly giving such powers and appropriating in general terms whatever sum is sufficient therefor.

"In so important a matter as the Government becoming the possible owner of railroad property which it perforce must conduct and operate, I feel constrained to lay before Congress these facts for its consideration and action before the consummation of the sale. It is clear to my mind that the Government should not permit the property to be sold at a price which will yield less than one-half of the principal of its debt and less than one-fifth of its entire debt, principal and interest. But whether the Government, rather than accept less than its claim, should become a bidder, and thereby the owner of the property, I submit to the Congress for action."

And no information having been given officially to Congress as to the authority under which such sale of the Kansas Pacific Railroad is to be made, or by what means, or under what proceedings a sale thereof has been authorized, it is impossible to proceed to consider whether any and what amendment of "the act of 1887" is needed for the protection of the Government, or to pay the same, as the President advises Congress to do, in his message: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Attorney-General is directed to send to the Senate a full statement of the authority for and the proceedings under which such sale is to be made.

Resolved, That the President is requested to obtain a postponement of such sale to such a time as will give to Congress a reasonable time to consider and act upon his recommendations.

The preamble was agreed to.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO POST-OFFICE COMMITTEE.

Mr. GALLINGER. By direction of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably with an amendment the resolution submitted by the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], and in his behalf I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is authorized to employ an assistant clerk, whose compensation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was, after the word "clerk," in line 2, to insert "until the expiration of the present fiscal year, at the rate of $1,440 per annum."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator that he use the phrase "additional clerk" instead of "assistant clerk." The clerk has official duties prescribed by statute.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN THE VALLEY OF THE YUKON.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I introduce a joint resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 72) for the relief of American miners and other sufferers in the valley of the Yukon and its tributaries was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be authorized to purchase food and supplies and to transport and distribute the same and food and other supplies furnished by or under the direction of the Portland Chamber of Commerce, Portland, Oreg., and by other like organizations and by individuals or corporations for the relief of American miners and other sufferers in the valley of the Yukon River and its tributaries. And a sufficient sum of money, not exceeding $250,000, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the purposes of this resolution. And the Secretary of War is authorized, in his discretion, to use the military forces of the United States and to employ private persons and such means of transportation as he may deem necessary to carry the purpose of this joint resolution into effect.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it go over and be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the joint resolution goes over.

Mr. McBRIDE. I ask leave to present a petition upon this subject. As it is a matter of great public importance, and the petition is brief, I ask that it be read at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the petition will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

[The Portland Chamber of Commerce, W. S. Mason, president; Chas. F. Beebe, vice-president; D. D. Oliphant, secretary; Ladd & Tilton, treasurer.]

PORTLAND, OREG., November 29, 1897.

The Hon. William McKinley, President of the United States, and Congress assembled.

GENTLEMEN: Overwhelming evidence testifying to the grave danger which confronts the American miners on the Yukon and its tributaries with the dreaded horrors of starvation when the present small stock of provisions shall be exhausted demands of us, as humane people blessed with abundance, that everything in our power shall be done to relieve the distress which is almost a certainty unless supplies of food can be transported to the imprisoned miners. With this object in view, the Portland Chamber of Commerce has communicated with kindred organizations throughout the United States, and has obtained in almost every instance assurances of hearty cooperation in furnishing the necessary supplies so soon as the Government shall promise to transport the same to their destination and supervise their distribution.

Private resources are wholly inadequate to the task involved. Out of our abundant storehouses the people of the Northwest tributary to Portland are capable of furnishing food supplies in quantity sufficient to provide against the impending distress, but lack the means necessary to transport the same; and to provide for this we appeal to the nation through its Chief Executive and its representatives in Congress, to the end that an expedition, under the management of officers of the Army or Navy, be provided for and instructed to make all possible haste in the accomplishment of the mission intrusted to them.

Assurances thus far received warrant us in guaranteeing to the Government that the people of the United States, and especially that portion immediately tributary to Portland, will supply all the food products which the Government will undertake to transport to the beleaguered miners, and we earnestly pray that your excellencies will heed our petition and lend to it your valuable support.

With assurances of our most loyal consideration, we have the honor of subscribing ourselves,

Your most obedient servants,

THE PORTLAND CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By W. S. MASON, President.

D. D. OLIPHANT, Secretary.

Mr. McBRIDE. Accompanying the petition which has just been read there is a clipping from a newspaper containing interviews with reputable persons in the Northwest respecting the lack of food supply among the American miners upon the Yukon River and its tributaries. I ask that the newspaper clipping be printed in the RECORD in connection with the petition which has been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be the order.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FAMINE IN DAWSON—FEAR OF STARVATION CAUSES A STAMPEDE OF MINERS—MAGEE PARTY REACHES SEATTLE WITH LATEST NEWS FROM THE INTERIOR—THEIR HARD JOURNEY OVER THE DALTON TRAIL.

SEATTLE, WASH., November 28, 1897.

Twenty-five men arrived here to-day on the City of Seattle, direct from Dawson City. They were divided into two parties, the last of which left Dawson October 16. The party consisted of Thomas Magee, sr., Thomas Magee, jr., of San Francisco; "Swiftwater Bill" Gates, Joe Boyle, William Huskins, F. Eckert, H. Robertson, H. Raymond, Bert Nelson, John W. Brauer, W. H. Chambers, E. W. Pond, E. Ash, J. Gillis, Thomas Wilson, P. McGraw, Jack Dalton, William Leak, Arthur Celine, Joseph Fairburn, J. Smith, T. Warren; Jim Ferguson, and two others whose names could not be learned to-night. They came out over the Dalton trail. They are reported to have between them $50,000 in drafts and gold dust.

All tell stories of a food shortage in Dawson that is almost a famine. The last person to leave Dawson was Jack Dalton. When Dalton left, the steamers Alice and Bella had reached there, loaded light. It is said that the Bella's cargo consisted of whisky and billiard balls. She brought no provisions.

The Canadian mounted police chartered the Bella and gave all who wished free passage to Fort Yukon. The Bella is reported to have left about October 12, with 200 men.

TROUBLE AT DAWSON CITY.

According to the statements made by members of the Dalton party, there is liable to be trouble of the most serious kind this winter in Dawson. Billy Leak told one of the men in the party ahead of him at Dyea that all the people talked about at Dawson was the food famine. Men were gathered in groups and cursing, might and main, the newcomers that were constantly entering the Klondike with scarcely any provisions.

The mounted police were offering free transportation to the grub piles farther down the Yukon, but to countless hundreds who had labored hard all through the summer accumulating a grub stake, the prospect was uninviting, to say the least. These men figured that it would take all their savings in gold to pay their living expenses at Fort Yukon during the winter, and that in the spring they would not have even enough gold left to pay passage money back to Dawson, to say nothing of purchasing enough food to subsist until they could get started again. To these poor fellows the offer of the mounted police was no better than the prospect at Dawson of being compelled to winter on half rations until the supply boats could reach the diggings in the spring.

THE ONLY SALVATION.

John W. Brauer, the United States mail carrier, who left Dawson September 27, said:

"There is only one salvation for the miners who are now at Dawson City, and that is for them to undertake the awful winter trip from Dawson to Fort Yukon, a distance of 400 miles. There is food at Fort Yukon; there is none at Dawson, and just as sure as the stars shine, terrible suffering will be the fate of the Dawson miner unless he leaves there before spring. I will make my statement conservative, and say that when I left Dawson the men who were there had on an average four months' food supply. Some did not have a month's supply; some had four or five.

"The last restaurant closed the night I left. It had been selling nothing but beefsteak, for which the hungry paid $2.50.

THE STAMPEDE BEGUN.

"When the people realized that no more boats would be up the river, they knew that starvation threatened them, and the great stampede began. The first to leave went to Fort Yukon. I think there were 200 in the party that left the first day.

"One boat came up from Fort Yukon with several newspaper men aboard, among them being Sam Wall and Mr. McGillvra. They brought the news that the Hamilton had unloaded all of her cargo and tried to get over the bar light and failed in her efforts, though she drew but 2 feet of water. This news increased the excitement and made the rush toward food centers all the greater.

"September 14, with Bert Nelson, of Seattle, I left Circle City and started to pole up the river to Dawson City, a distance of 300 miles. At the time we started from Circle City the miners had about all left. It took us eleven days and three hours to make the journey, arriving at Dawson September 26. Captain Hanson, with two Indians, who had left Fort Yukon, beat us into Dawson by about an hour and a half.

"Hanson gathered the Dawson City miners together and made a short speech, in which he advised all who did not have provisions to last them all winter to either get out of the country to civilization or try and reach points in the Yukon country where it was known that food could be found.

EXCITING NIGHT IN DAWSON.

"That night was the greatest one in the history of Dawson City. The miners, as soon as they had heard the news, made hasty preparations to get out, and nightfall saw goldseekers and men who can to-day sell out for many thousands leaving by the hundreds for down the river and up the river. The little steamer Kiukuk, which was to make trips from Dawson to Pelly, where Jack Dalton's trail starts, was brought into play. She was besieged by would-be passengers, who offered as high as $250 that they might be aboard while she made her journey of 175 miles to Pelly. The Kiukuk left Dawson on the afternoon of September 27 with twelve or fifteen passengers.

"The next day we made up a party, including Herbert Raymond, of Seattle; N. Bert Nelson, of Seattle; Harry Robertson, of San Francisco, and myself. We started up the river in a small river boat, the same one we had used in going from Circle City to Dawson. We left Dawson about 2 p. m., and were soon on our way up the river.

"While Jack Dalton left Dawson a couple of days later, the situation there then was the same as it was when we left, and I can tell you about that in a very few words. The only thing you could possibly buy was sugar, baking powder, spices, and some dried fruit. No flour, bacon, or anything of that kind could be purchased in any of the stores, simply because they did not have them. So long as the stores had any provisions prices remained the same. I want to say that the stores treated the men all right, and never advanced the prices, notwithstanding they were aware of the shortage and knew that they had but to ask for higher prices and receive. I know of an instance where a private party sold to a miner a sack of flour for $75 and bacon at $5 a pound."

STORES CLEANED OUT.

Mr. Ferguson said:

"The situation at Dawson was relieved by the exodus to Fort Yukon. I doubt if there will be any actual starvation there, but there will be a shortage. The old-timers have provisions to carry them through. The stores are practically cleaned out. All they would sell was 5 pounds of sugar to the man. Flour could not be bought at all. One or two sacks were quickly picked up at $200 a sack.

"Wages are still $15 a day, but they are sure to go down to $8 by next summer, and $8 a day there is no better than $1.50 a day outside.

"I can not say how much dust was brought out. Our party carried practically little, having drafts instead."

THOMAS MAGEE'S STORY.

Thomas Magee, sr., the well-known capitalist of San Francisco, in an interview with the correspondent of the Associated Press, said:

"The excitement of the failure of steamers to bring food to Dawson continued when the Dalton party left. The police took charge of the stores and warehouses of the North American and Alaska Commercial companies, as a precaution only. Flour was selling at $2 per pound, and one sale of 50-pound sacks at $250 was made. No plans had yet been formulated to avert the starvation of those who are short of provisions. Those well supplied have not much sympathy with those who are short, because of the fact that the majority of these latter went in with little food, although abundantly warned at Lake Bennett in advance. A scarcity, if not a famine, will prevail.

SHOT FOR STEALING FOOD.

"Two men were shot in Dawson who were caught stealing food. One was found dead; the other was fatally wounded and died at the Catholic hospital. It is believed that a secret organization exists for the purpose of shooting down thieves.

"The organization of hunting parties for the winter to hunt moose was talked of, and will be carried out.

"Dysentery and accompanying fever were general at Dawson last summer. They were caused by miasma from the swamp on which the business town was built and the entire absence of drainage and sewerage. These conditions will be greatly intensified next summer, and an epidemic is predicted. The river water is bad, but there is one fine spring of water out at the Catholic hospital.

"Nothing was talked of but the grub question. The result will probably be the formation of a public committee to gather up voluntary or enforced contributions, the food thus gathered to be publicly dispensed and paid for by work or cash by those to whom it is given.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN ST. PAUL, MINN.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what, if any, changes in the plans and specifications of the custom-house and post-office building, now in process of construction in the city of St. Paul, Minn., are required in order that said building may be finished for the best accommodation to the general public and for the proper transaction of the public business.

REPORT ON LABOR LAWS.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That there be printed 8,000 additional copies, in cloth binding, of the Second Special Report of the Commissioner of Labor, comprising the labor laws of the United States and of the State and Territorial governments, being a report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, submitted July 20, 1892, and revised and annotated in accordance with concurrent resolution adopted March 5, 1896, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for distribution by the Department of Labor.

PARIS EXPOSITION OF 1900.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 30,000 extra copies of the Report of the Special Commissioner of the United States to the International Exposition to be held at Paris, 1900, 10,000 copies to be for the use of the Senate, 15,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for the use of the Department of State.

REPORT ON ITALIANS IN CHICAGO.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That there be printed and bound in cloth 8,000 additional copies of the Ninth Special Report of the Commissioner of Labor, relating to the Italians in Chicago, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for distribution by the Department of Labor.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR GEORGE.

Mr. WALTHALL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the expenses incurred by the select committee appointed by the President of the Senate to take order for the funeral of the late Senator James Z. George, of Mississippi, be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of said committee.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently reported without amendment the above resolution from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF NAVAL LAND ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be directed to inquire into the needs of the Navy for additional dry docks, stationary or floating, and concerning the proper location of any new stationary docks; also to inquire to what extent the various naval stations and naval yards should be maintained in a condition of efficiency as workshops for the construction or repair of ships of war, or for special naval work, or for sanitary purposes, and whether or not the existing scale of expenditures at such stations and yards can be reduced without detriment to the public service; and further, generally to ascertain the probable requirements of appropriations for the naval service to be expended for the land establishment of the Navy as distinguished from the vessels and ordnance of the Navy and their appurtenances designed for a Navy upon the ocean.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. At the request of several Senators on both sides of the Chamber, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the morning hour one hour be devoted to the consideration of private pension bills now on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate has heard the request made by the Senator from New Hampshire. Is there any objection to it? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request is that at the conclusion of the morning hour one hour be devoted to the consideration of private pension bills on the Calendar.

Mr. TURPIE. Unobjected cases?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unobjected cases, the Chair understands. Is that the request?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; unobjected cases.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not wish to make any objection to that order, but, since the permission has been asked, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Pension Committee how many pension bills there are now on the Senate Calendar reported favorably by the Committee on Pensions and how many there are pending in Congress?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There are over two hundred upon the present Calendar of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator from Connecticut has raised that question, for the reason that it enables me to make a statement concerning the matter of pensions, which I shall make with the utmost frankness to the Senate and the country.

My impression is that there are about two hundred bills now on the Calendar which have received the indorsement of the Committee on Pensions. Those bills, as I stated on a former occasion, cover the bills that during the last two or three Congresses have passed the Senate, but failed to receive the favorable consideration of the House. They are not new bills in any sense of the word.

As to the number of private pension bills at the present time before Congress, I will say that on yesterday I had the matter examined, and it appears that during the late extraordinary session 917 private pension bills were introduced in the Senate, and during the present session, not including to-day, 58 bills have been introduced in the Senate, making a total of 975. In addition to that, 40 general pension bills were introduced in the Senate during the extraordinary session.

If I may be permitted to speak of the other House in this connection (and I take it there is no impropriety in it), I find that during the extraordinary session 1,300 private pension bills were introduced into the House, and that up to this morning 70 additional bills were introduced, making a total of 1,370. Those bills went to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It will be remembered that in the House of Representatives there are two committees on pensions. To the Committee on Pensions 250 private pension bills were referred during the extraordinary session. This makes a total of 2,635 bills introduced into both Houses since the beginning of the present Congress. But it is proper I should remark that many of the bills introduced into the House are duplicates of bills introduced into the Senate, so that it is impossible to state definitely the exact number of bills; but I should say that they aggregate about 2,000.

As chairman of the Committee on Pensions, I want to say to the Senate in its collective capacity what I said some months ago to the individual members of the Senate by letter: that I am constrained to feel that there is a laxity on the part of the individual Senators in sending bills to the committee of which I chance to be chairman. It seems to me that bills are introduced without examination, without inquiry, upon simply the request of the soldier who has had his claim rejected at the Pension Bureau. The result is that in this one committee room there are to-day over one thousand bills engaging attention, and correspondence concerning those bills is coming to the committee from all over the country. I have adopted the plan of answering every letter that comes to that committee, and I submit that it is my right to ask that Senators should individually examine and satisfy themselves that the bills have some merit before they send them to the committee, to add unnecessary burdens to the chairman and his assistants—burdens which we ought not to be asked to bear.

Mr. President, on this pension question I share with other members of this body a great deal of concern. I am a friend to the soldier, and my policy has been one of extreme liberality so far as pension legislation is concerned. But I am satisfied that in this matter of private pension legislation we have gone to the extreme limit, and that we ought to call a halt. It is becoming quite the fashion for almost every soldier in the country whose pension claim is rejected at the Bureau, where it has had full and fair and impartial consideration, to write to a Member of Congress or a Senator that he wants a bill introduced for his special benefit, and that bill is introduced and comes to the committee. If that custom continues to grow as it has been growing for the past five years, we will have a practical pension bureau in this Capitol reviewing every claim rejected by the regular Bureau of Pensions, which Bureau is to-day administering the pension law in a very just and liberal manner.

There are many claims rejected by the Pension Bureau upon purely technical grounds—there are some rejected upon differences of opinion between the State medical boards and the medical officers of the Pension Bureau—that properly engage our attention, and concerning which we ought affirmatively to legislate. But I am constrained to feel that we are going rather too far in this matter and that it is our duty to exercise the greatest possible conservatism in the future in the matter of private pension legislation.

Personally, I hope that during this session the Senate will refuse to pass bills of certain classes that heretofore we have acted upon to some extent. In my judgment we ought to refuse to pass every case of a remarried widow, who yielded her claim to a pension when she married a second time, and who, upon the death of her second husband, comes to Congress asking us to put her name on the pension roll by a special act. In my opinion we ought also to stop pensioning daughters, whether it is of the war of the Revolution or the war of 1812 or any other war. We have legislated to a limited extent in that direction, and it is now time to stop it.

There are other classes that do not now come to my mind, but which, I promise, shall engage the attention of the Committee on Pensions.

I want to put myself on record, also, as being in favor of the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions that we should speedily enact a law providing that no pension shall be paid to the widow of a soldier who shall be married subsequent to the passage of the act, of course excepting those who may enter the military service in the meantime; in other words, that as to the old soldiers who are now permitting themselves to be married to young girls, we should put a stop to the granting of widows' pensions under those conditions. It is a remarkable and alarming fact that we have on the pension rolls to-day a few names of the widows of the Revolutionary war, and a good many names of the widows of the war of 1812.

In my judgment, when the law of 1890 was passed and when a provision was inserted that under that act pensions should not be granted to those who married subsequent to that time, that provision ought to have been made general. I am in favor of legislation in that direction at the earliest possible moment, and have introduced a bill covering that point.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he does not believe that a more equitable disposition of the pensions of the United States would be of greater benefit to a greater number of soldiers and not increase the total expenditure of money?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am in favor of revising the pension laws whenever that seems necessary, but I have no idea that we should or can make a radical revision of those laws. Possibly the Senator from Nebraska has in mind what he called the attention of the Senate to a good many times, and for which he has taken me to task very properly sometimes—our habit of granting by special act large pensions to the widows of general officers.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I have that in mind.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that the Senator from Nebraska has almost converted me on that subject.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad to know it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have put myself on record in correspondence recently against granting large increases, except in most extraordinary and exceptional cases, to the widows of general officers. We have gone too far in that direction. A bad example was set to the country when enormously large pensions were granted to a few widows of distinguished officers, and we have been forced by tremendous pressure and the exercise of influence that was almost irresistible to continue that bad practice to a certain extent. I think we have reached a point where we can effect a great reform in that direction, and I shall be glad to join the Senator from Nebraska in effecting that reform.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad to learn that I have succeeded in converting the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Nebraska had a very excellent influence upon my mind in the discussions that have occurred, and while I shall not in the future agree with him on all points that will be involved, yet I think I can promise him that we shall cooperate to a very considerable extent in the direction that he indicates. Mr. President, I trust that an hour will be granted to-day for the consideration of private pension bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request? The Chair hears none.

GRANT OF LANDS TO VALENTINE, NEBR.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (S. 28) granting to the incorporated town of Valentine, in the county of Cherry and State of Nebraska, certain lands, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That when any of said lands cease to be used by said incorporated town of Valentine, or its successor, for the uses and purposes herein contemplated, the same shall revert to the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us hear the report read or let some explanation be given of the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I will make a brief statement of the reason why I think the bill should pass.

The village of Valentine is the county seat of Cherry County, a county almost 75 miles square. It is between 275 and 300 miles northwest of the city of Omaha, and is in what is known as the semiarid region of Nebraska. The village lies on the north side of the Niobrara River, between the Niobrara River and a creek known as the Minichaduza. I should say that the distance across from the Niobrara to the Minichaduza is a little over half a mile. It is between a half and three-quarters of a mile from the Niobrara River, south of the city of Valentine, to the Minichaduza.

South of the Niobrara River is a very low, flat country devoted to pastoral pursuits. North of the Minichaduza is a very extensive ridge or outflux of stone and chalk, and the country is worthless for many miles north of that. Between the flats, the town of Valentine, and the Minichaduza River lies a portion of this land, and east of the town lies a portion of it. It was at one time attached to Fort Niobrara for military purposes, but it has been abandoned for those purposes and turned back to the public domain. It is not fit for agricultural purposes, because it is not, strictly speaking, an agricultural country. It is a grass and cattle growing country. The people of the town have no place for a cemetery. They have no place for a fair ground, a public park, or for things of that kind. The policy of the bill is to turn this land over to them for such purposes so long as they may use it in that way, and it is provided that it shall revert to the Government whenever they cease to use it as indicated in the bill.

I have the report of the committee here, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. ALLEN March 31, 1897, as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 28) granting to the incorporated town of Valentine, in the county of Cherry and State of Nebraska, certain lands, and for other purposes, beg leave to report as follows:

Amend the bill by adding, after line 15, the following:

"Provided, That when any of said lands cease to be used by said incorporated town of Valentine, or its successor, for the uses and purposes herein contemplated, the same shall revert to the United States."

The incorporated town of Valentine is the county seat of Cherry County, Nebr., located on the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad, about 275 miles northwest of Omaha. It is located on the bank of a small stream known as the Niobrara River. The land described in the bill was formerly a part of the military reservation of Fort Niobrara; but on application the War Department segregated the same and it is now a part of the public domain, and is no longer regarded as valuable or necessary for military purposes. The land west and south of Valentine is sandy and broken, and the village has been unable to obtain a suitable place for cemetery, fair grounds, and for other proper public purposes, while the lands lying east and described in the bill are desirable for these purposes.

The land lying north and east of the village contains suitable sites for factories, and is near an abundance of water. It is represented that the water power is only approachable by the land described in the bill, and that unless the land above mentioned is ceded to the village the people will be unable to utilize the water power that would otherwise be at their disposal. Valentine is a long distance from market. The land in that locality is not the best agricultural land in Nebraska, nor highly valuable for agricultural purposes, but would possess some value for raising sugar beets and other crops. With this land the village of Valentine would be able to provide a suitable cemetery and fair grounds and make concessions to those desiring to establish mills and factories, and by that means greatly develop that section of the country.

The facts are set forth more fully in the annexed affidavit. The land possesses no particular value to the Government, and it is believed by your committee that it can not be disposed of to any greater advantage than by being given to the village of Valentine under the restrictions contained in this bill.

STATE OF NEBRASKA, County of Cherry, ss:

Personally appeared before me, W. E. Haley, a notary public in and for said county, the following subscribed citizens, who, being first duly sworn, each upon his oath says:

That the said land was, prior to the introduction of said bills, a part of the military reservation of Fort Niobrara, Nebr., but upon application having been made for the same by said village the War Department at once segregated said land, and it is now a part of the public lands in the Department of the Interior, awaiting action on these bills. This is certainly conclusive evidence that the land is no longer valuable for military purposes, and indicates that the military believe it valuable for the purposes stated in our petition of February 11, 1896.

That owing to the broken and sandy soil (sand hills) west and south of the town, we have been unable to acquire suitable grounds for cemetery and for fair-ground purposes, and that the land lying east and contiguous to the town embraced within these bills is very desirable for said purposes. That the land lying north and east contains suitable site for a beet-sugar factory near an abundance of water. That there has already been a man on the grounds, representing Eastern capital, looking to building a factory, and that now negotiations are at a standstill pending action on this matter, and provided these measures become a law in all probability Valentine will have a beet-sugar factory before very long. And further, at the extreme eastern edge of said tract, the stream can be made to furnish a 100 horsepower (water power), and since fuel is so very high priced the water power will offer an attractive inducement for a woolen mill or other manufactory.

That we, in asking for this land, do so in the interest of the town and surrounding country and not in the interest of any individual or corporation, and that we greatly need and shall be grateful for favorable action on the measure.

STATE OF NEBRASKA, Cherry County, ss:

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 10th day of December, A. D. 1896.
[SEAL.] W. E. HALEY, Notary Public.
(Commission expires April 17, 1900.)

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands, which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHMOND LOCOMOTIVE AND MACHINE WORKS.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at the present time of the bill (S. 1133) to pay to the Richmond Locomotive and Machine Works its claim for damages and losses incurred in the construction of the armored battle ship Texas.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to the Richmond Locomotive and Machine Works $69,550.39 in full of its claim for damages and losses incurred in the construction of the armored battle ship Texas.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN THE VALLEY OF THE YUKON.

Mr. McBRIDE. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate such information as he has respecting the lack of sufficient food supplies among the American citizens who have gone into the mining districts of the Yukon River and its tributaries, and whether, in his judgment, there is danger of actual suffering from a want of such supplies unless relief is afforded by public or private contributions.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the resolution will pass. It is very appropriate. I objected to the passage of the joint resolution which the Senator offered a few minutes ago, simply because we have no official information upon which to found our action. This resolution calls upon the Secretary of War for information. We can soon get a report from him, and then we shall have some data upon which to base our action.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution, but I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon whether there are not sufficient facts already within his possession to justify him in offering a relief bill for the consideration of the Senate without waiting for a reply from the Secretary of War to such a resolution as he has offered?

Mr. McBRIDE. In reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, I will state that I introduced a joint resolution providing for an appropriation of not exceeding $250,000 for the purchase of food and other supplies and for the transportation of the same, and also for the transportation of the food and other supplies which may be contributed by chambers of commerce or other corporations or individuals. That joint resolution went over on objection of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The facts, I will state, are contained briefly in a petition of the Portland Chamber of Commerce presented by me to the Senate this morning and in an article published in the Daily Oregonian, of Portland, Oreg., which have gone into the RECORD.

In my own judgment the facts set forth in the petition and the newspaper article referred to are sufficient to justify the Senate in acting upon the joint resolution; but under the objection of the Senator from Missouri, who has expressed a desire to have official information, that joint resolution has gone over, and I have offered the resolution which is now pending.

Mr. CHANDLER. Am I to understand from the Senator from Oregon that he expects a reply from the Secretary of War very shortly, so that the consideration of the relief bill may be proceeded with without much delay?

Mr. McBRIDE. I hope so, and I have no doubt the joint resolution will be promptly passed when the information desired by the Senator from Missouri has been transmitted by the Secretary of War. We shall have the report before us possibly within a day or two.

The resolution was agreed to.

ARMY EXPLORATIONS IN ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and is hereby, directed to investigate and report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the extent to which the Territory of Alaska has been explored by the Army of the United States, and what, if any, aid the Army may be able to lend in opening, protecting, and maintaining regular lines of communication exclusively within the territory of the United States, from tide water into the interior of said Territory, and what measures may with propriety be adopted to avert hostilities with and to secure the friendly cooperation of the native population of said Territory in developing the resources thereof.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. It will result without expense, I anticipate, in securing desired information concerning the extent to which the Army has heretofore explored this vast region, and what, if any, additional explorations should be conducted by the Army.

Aside from the matter of exploration, to which the resolution directs attention, it will be observed that reference is made to whatever measures may with propriety be employed to avert hostilities with and to secure the friendly cooperation of the natives of Alaska in the development of the resources of the country. Heretofore, unfortunately, population has rushed into the territories occupied by the Indians without any provision being made in advance by the Government to prevent the natural friction which usually results from the meeting of strange peoples, and this friction has generally resulted in hostilities which have involved very great expense to the Government and loss of life in attempting to secure peace.

It does seem that by certain wise precautions, which could perhaps be as effectively taken through the Army as any other branch of the service, certain of the native chiefs and leading or influential Indians of the respective districts might be employed in the service of the Army and interested in the work of development prior to the time that the great unorganized mass of men rush into the Territory to take possession of it by force and without much regard for the rights of the aborigines found in possession.

I think the resolution will evolve a certain line of information greatly needed by the Senate and the Congress generally in dealing with the great problems presented in that immense Territory.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall not object, of course, to the consideration of the resolution, but I trust after this item of business shall have been disposed of that we shall proceed to execute the agreement to consider pension cases.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator, I hope, will permit me to make a brief comment upon the resolution offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Montana did me the honor to read the resolution to me before he offered it, and I entirely concur in his purpose. I do not know that it is necessary to amend the resolution at all, because if it be sent to the Committee on Military Affairs it will, it seems to me, be wise for us not only to call upon the Army for information, but to consult those civilians who have been the heads of various expeditions outside the Army; in short, to get at all sources of information as to what may be needed for keeping the peace and caring for the people of Alaska.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WASHINGTON, PA.

Mr. QUAY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1270) to provide for the erection of a public building at Washington, Pa.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate not exceeding $75,000 for a site, and to cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices, at Washington and State of Pennsylvania.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair now calls attention to the special order of business, the consideration of private pension bills for one hour.

Mr. QUAY. Before proceeding to the consideration of pension bills, I desire to inquire whether there is any understanding as to the appropriation of the session this afternoon after the conclusion of that order? The Senate has great faith in the Committee on Pensions, and I suppose a number of us, if there is no other business to be transacted, will leave the pension bills in the custody of that committee. If the Senator from New Hampshire does not object, I will suggest, if it is not already the understanding, that at the conclusion of the order for the consideration of pension bills the Senate adjourn without transacting other business. That will liberate Senators from attendance this afternoon.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is proper, perhaps, that I should say, in the absence of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], that he said to me he intended at 2 o'clock to move to take up the immigration bill, not for immediate consideration, but to make it the unfinished business. I do not know whether the Senator from Pennsylvania is opposed to that procedure or not.

Mr. QUAY. I am not. I am very much in favor of the immigration bill, and shall not interpose any obstacle to its progress. So I will withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. BUTLER. In accordance with the notice heretofore given, I ask the Senate to consider at this time the bill (S. 2369) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes, in order that I may make some remarks on the amendments I have submitted to that bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is always an ungracious thing to object to a request for unanimous consent, but as I gave notice a moment ago that I should ask that the order to proceed to the consideration of pension bills be executed, I trust the Senator will allow his bill to go over until the hour for pension bills has been exhausted. The Senator will have an opportunity afterwards.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well.

ENOCH G. ADAMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first private pension bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 1462) granting an increase of pension to Enoch G. Adams was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Enoch G. Adams, late captain of Company D, First Regiment United States Infantry, at $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NANCY G. ALLABACH.

The bill (S. 1702) granting an increase of pension to Nancy G. Allabach was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Nancy G. Allabach, widow of Peter H. Allabach, late colonel One hundred and thirty-first Pennsylvania Volunteers, and to pay her a pension of $30 per month, in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY W. C. BURGESS.

The bill (S. 1581) granting a pension to Mary W. C. Burgess was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mary W. C. Burgess, widow of Benjamin F. Burgess, late acting assistant surgeon, United States Army, and to pay her a pension of $17 per month.

Mr. PETTUS. I should like to hear the report in that case read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report of the committee will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. GALLINGER June 29, 1897, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1581) granting a pension to Mary W. C. Burgess, have examined the same and report:

The claimant under this bill is the widow of Dr. Benjamin F. Burgess, who served as a volunteer acting assistant surgeon in the late war. As Dr. Burgess was not mustered into the service, his widow can not secure pension under the general laws, but her case is one of such acknowledged merit as to fully justify the passage of a special bill.

The following statement from Mrs. Burgess sets forth the facts in the case:

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your petitioner, Mary N. C. Burgess, of Gilmanton, in the county of Belknap and State of New Hampshire, respectfully submits the following statement, and requests that a pension may be granted her by special act of Congress, and for the reasons for said request she makes the following statement of facts: That she is the widow of Benjamin F. Burgess, M. D., who died at Wareham, in the county of Plymouth and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, January 5, 1864. That she was married to said Benjamin F. Burgess at Gilmanton, N. H., on the 20th day of September, A. D. 1849, and lived and cohabited with her said husband until his death as aforesaid.

That on or about the 1st day of July, A. D. 1862, her said husband, in response to a letter sent him by the then surgeon-general of Massachusetts, hereunto annexed and marked A, left his home in Wareham, aforesaid, and went to the assistance of the sick and wounded soldiers near Fortress Monroe, as an assistant volunteer surgeon: that he was assigned to duty with the Thirty-second New York Volunteers, in General Palmer's brigade, General Couch's division, as appears by exhibit marked B; that he remained on duty with said regiment for about ten days, or until the surgeon of said regiment returned for duty, when he returned to his home in Wareham; that he did faithful service. (See exhibits marked C and D.)

That my husband was a strong and active man and attended to a large country practice up to the time of his services in the Army. That he came home therefrom sick with chills and fever and never recovered his health. During his absence he lost in flesh nearly 40 pounds. From the time of his return to the time of his death he was able to perform but a small amount of work in his profession. That his age at time of his death was 39 years and 4 months. That at the time of his death I was 34 years of age and was left with four children, the oldest of whom was 13 and the youngest 2 years. That I have supported and educated all of said children by my own efforts. My age at the present time is 69. I now apply for a pension under special act of Congress for the following reasons:

First. There is no general law under which I can apply for and be granted a pension.

Second. I am fully satisfied that my husband died from the effects of disease contracted in the service of his country.

Third. That having by hard and continuous labor supported myself and family without asking any aid from the Government since my husband's death, I am now, in my old age, justified in asking a reasonable pension during the remainder of my life.

Fourth. That my husband left but a small property, and that was entirely used up in supporting myself and family many years ago.

MARY N. C. BURGESS.

Col. Thomas Cogswell, a distinguished soldier, at present serving as pension agent at Concord, N. H., gives this testimony:

I, Thomas Cogswell, of Gilmanton, in the county of Belknap and State of New Hampshire, state that Mary N. C. Burgess, who signed the annexed application to Congress for a pension by special act, is my sister. I well knew her husband, Dr. Benjamin F. Burgess, who for a time was an acting volunteer surgeon during the war of the rebellion; that he resided and did business at Wareham, Mass. I frequently visited my sister at Wareham before the war, and know that Dr. Burgess was then a strong, active man, and was doing a large practice in his profession. In the fall of 1863 I again visited Dr. Burgess, and found him sick and able to do but very little work. I feel sure he had chills and fever, because I had suffered from the same disease and knew the symptoms. I have no doubt but that the disease contracted in the Army was the cause of his death. I further state that his widow, Mary N. C. Burgess, has taken care of and educated her four children, and that she is now advanced in years and needs a pension for her comfortable support.

THOMAS COGSWELL.

The following are copies of official documents in the hands of your committee:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
OFFICE OF SURGEON-GENERAL,
Boston, July 2, 1862.

DEAR SIR: I want you to come up to-morrow prepared for active service in the field at Baltimore.

Bring your valise with you and pocket case, prepared to go on in the afternoon.

In haste, truly, yours,

WILLIAM J. DALE,
Surgeon-General.

Dr. BURGESS.

HEADQUARTERS GENERAL KEYES'S CORPS, July 6, 1862.

SIR: You will report for duty immediately to the colonel commanding the Thirty-fourth New York Volunteers, General Palmer, Brigadier-General Couch's division, as acting assistant surgeon, next in rank to the present acting assistant surgeon, Dr. Good.

Very respectfully, yours,

FRANK A. HAMILTON,
Medical Director, Fourth Corps.

BENJAMIN F. BURGESS, M. D.,
Acting Assistant Surgeon, U. S. A.

HEADQUARTERS OF PALMER'S BRIGADE, COUCH'S DIVISION, July 14.

Dr. B. F. Burgess, volunteer surgeon, has been on duty in the Thirty-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers, of this brigade, during the illness and absence of the surgeons of the regiment. His service during the time has been invaluable to the regiment, most satisfactory to all, both general and officers. He has been a most faithful medical officer during the time he has been associated with us.

CHARLES O'LEARY,
Staff Surgeon, Medical Director of Division.

HEADQUARTERS OF BRIGADE, July 14, 1862.

Surg. B. F. Burgess has been on duty with my brigade attending to the wounded and sick from the late battlefields for two weeks. He leaves now for Massachusetts by authority, and commanders of Government hospitals are requested to pass him to Baltimore.

J. W. PALMER,
Brigadier-General, Commanding Third Brigade, Couch's Division.

It is conclusively shown that Dr. Burgess promptly responded to the call of the surgeon-general of Massachusetts at a time when his services were greatly needed; that he rendered distinguished service on the field, and that he doubtless contracted malaria while in the Army, which resulted in his death.

In view of these facts, your committee report the bill back favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. MARTHA FRANK.

The bill (S. 485) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha Frank was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pension Mrs. Martha Frank, widow of William Frank, member of the company of Capt. John Little in the Indian war of 1818, at the rate of $8 per month.

Mr. PETTUS. Many of us have no knowledge of the facts, and I shall ask that all the reports be read with reference to these pension cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. I venture to suggest that I wish the Senator from Alabama had the reports on his desk, because I think he could readily satisfy himself as to the merit of these cases. This old lady is 103 years old, or she was about one year ago. She is now 104. The legislation of Congress regarding the Indian wars covers only the period from 1832 to 1842, while the soldier in this case served in an Indian war which is not covered by the general law. It is a very meritorious case, and we ought not to exhaust time in reading the report in connection with a bill of this kind. However, the report is brief, and I have no objection to its being read. Of course the Senator has a right to ask that the report shall be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. GALLINGER June 29, 1897, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 485) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha Frank, have examined the same and report:

A similar bill passed the Senate during the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress and was reported favorably by the House. The committee recommend the passage of the bill and adopt the Senate report, which is as follows:

"The claimant's late husband, William Frank, was a soldier in Capt. John E. Little's company of Georgia militia in the Florida Indian war of 1818. The records of the Second Auditor's Office, Treasury Department, show that the soldier enlisted February 13, 1818, and was discharged with the company May 4, 1818.

"The Indian war act of July 27, 1892, covers only the Indian wars from 1832 to 1842, inclusive, and hence there is no law under which this widow can obtain relief through an application at the Pension Bureau.

"The claimant under this bill resides in Greensboro, Ga., and is in her one hundred and third year. She is vouched for by many distinguished Union soldiers as a worthy and deserving woman.

"The passage of the bill is earnestly recommended."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES D. HANSCOM.

The bill (S. 501) granting an increase of pension to Charles D. Hanscom was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Charles D. Hanscom, late of Company I, Second Regiment Massachusetts Infantry Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. GALLINGER June 29, 1897, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 501) granting an increase of pension to Charles D. Hanscom, have examined the same and report:

A similar bill passed the Senate during the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress and was reported favorably by the House. Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, adopting the report of the Senate committee to the Fifty-fourth Congress, which report is as follows:

"The claimant under this bill enlisted May 1, 1861, at the very outbreak of the war and was discharged for disability December 12, 1863. He was severely wounded at the battle of Chancellorsville, the ball fracturing the thigh, resulting in complete anchylosis of the hip joint. Soldier was pensioned for the wound, which pension was increased from time to time until it reached $24 per month, the rate of disability 'equivalent to loss of hand or foot.' Subsequently the rate for loss of foot was increased to $30 per month, and soldier supposed that his pension would be increased to that rate, but the Department would not allow the increase. In 1891 a special act was passed increasing the pension to $36 per month, which rate soldier is now receiving.

"The following letter from the soldier graphically explains the circumstances under which the wound was received and the severity of it:

"PORTSMOUTH, N. H., May 21, 1896.

"MY DEAR SIR: Your second letter is received, for which I sincerely thank you, and believe that you will succeed.

"I have been carefully examined by Dr. William O. Junkins, who is chairman of the board of examining surgeons in this city. His report (or affidavit) please find inclosed. Perhaps it will be well for me to say a few words explanatory, so you may know the facts in detail.

"I enlisted May 15, 1861, for three years or the war, at $11 per month, in Company I, Second Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, in the regiment which General Cogswell afterwards commanded, and made my last charge before being wounded (which was May 5, 1863), under his leadership, in the fruitless attempt to capture 'Stonewall' Jackson's wagon train at Chancellorsville, where my younger brother was killed, when I was wounded.

"While kneeling on my right knee and standing on my left foot, with the knee bent and the thigh in a horizontal position, firing to the front, I saw a Confederate captain leading his company in a charge against our lines some distance to the right of our position, and thinking to stop him I turned in a right oblique position and fired at him, but before I could see for smoke I was knocked in a heap by a bullet and buckshot, which struck several inches below the groin on the front of the left thigh, and passed through the left hip joint. The buckshot passed through at once. The ounce ball was cut out on the back side of the buttock, some 12 inches from the place of entrance. My left hip joint was shattered, and is completely anchylosed. I can not reach below the knee with either hand, nor dress my foot without assistance. The joint at the hip being destroyed, I can only painfully walk by the action of the joint at the junction of the spine and pelvis frame. I can never rest, either sitting or standing, both causing pain. I can only rest when lying down; am consequently incapacitated from manual labor, and feel fully justified in making my claim.

"Awaiting developments, I remain, yours, very truly,

"CHARLES D. HANSCOM.

"Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"The following medical affidavit has been filed with your committee:

"GENERAL AFFIDAVIT.

"In the matter of pension claim No. 23049. Charles D. Hanscom, of Portsmouth, N. H., Company I, Second Regiment Massachusetts Infantry.

"On this 22d day of May, A. D. 1896, personally appeared before me, an officer in and for the hereinafter-named county and State, duly authorized to administer oaths, William O. Junkins, aged 51 years, whose post-office address is Portsmouth, N. H., and who, being duly sworn, declares in relation to aforesaid case as follows:

"Having this day examined the claimant, I make the following statement, said statement being written by my own hand: Complete anchylosis of left hip joint; no movement of head of femur in acetabulum; all movements accomplished by means of pelvis, consequently leg is in straight position; unable to dress foot without help; foot everted and walks on the outside of bottom of foot; crest of ilium presses on stomach, causing dyspepsia and gastralgia; can not sit for any length of time without support to pelvis and back; unable to perform any manual labor that requires the stooping position.

"I further declare that I have no interest in said case and am not concerned in its prosecution.

"WM. O. JUNKINS."

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE, County of Rockingham, ss:

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant, and I certify that I read said affidavit to affiant and acquainted him with its contents before he executed the same. I further certify that I am in no wise interested in said case, nor am I concerned in its prosecution; and that said affiant is a practicing physician and surgeon, well known to me; is chairman of the pension examining board of physicians, and at present mayor of the city of Portsmouth.

Witness my hand this 22d day of May, 1896.

SAMUEL R. GARDNER,
Justice of the Peace.

(Certificate of commission as justice of the peace on file in Pension Department.)

It will be observed that claimant's condition is such as to require the aid and attendance of another person a portion of the time, the rate for which under the general laws is $50 per month, as fixed by the act of July 14, 1892; but soldier is barred from applying under that law, as his last increase was by special act of Congress. This bill asks that his pension be increased to $50 per month, and your committee are of opinion that the circumstances of the case fully warrant favorable action.

The bill is therefore reported back with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DELIA GILMAN.

The bill (S. 487) granting a pension to Delia Gilman was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pension Delia Gilman, widow of Alvin Gilman, late of Company H, Fifth New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. PETTUS. I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions that all the bills which will come up this morning have been passed heretofore by the Senate and failed for want of consideration in the other House. Therefore I will withdraw the demand for the reading of the reports.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SARAH R. FRARY.

The bill (S. 499) granting a pension to Sarah R. Frary was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pension Sarah R. Frary, widow of Jedediah C. W. Frary, late of Company H, Eighteenth New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $8 per month.

MARGARET CUSTER CALHOUN.

The bill (S. 482) to increase the pension of Margaret Custer Calhoun was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pension Margaret Custer Calhoun, widow of Lieut. James Calhoun, late of the Seventh United States Cavalry, at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELLA D. CROSS.

The bill (S. 492) granting a pension to Ella D. Cross was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place upon the pension rolls the name of Ella D. Cross, widow of Richard E. Cross, late lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JANE B. JOHNSTON.

The bill (S. 943) granting a pension to Jane B. Johnston was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, before the word "Hospital," to strike out "Willets Point" and insert "Government;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane B. Johnston, an army nurse at Government Hospital, Throggs Neck, N. Y., during the war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAROLINE B. BRADFORD.

Waring, widow of the late Lieut. Howard S. Waring, of the United States Navy, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $50 a month, in lieu of any other pension.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN BALTIMORE, MD.

Mr. GORMAN. If it does not interfere with the pension bills, I should like to call up Senate bill 710, relative to a new public building in Baltimore.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill (S. 710) to provide for the purchase of additional land in the square now occupied by the custom-house in the city of Baltimore, Md., and for the erection of a new public building thereon for the accommodation of the Government service in said city was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in section 2, line 20, before the word "million," to strike out "two" and insert "one and one-half;" and in line 23, before the word "million," to strike out "two" and insert "one and one-half;" so as to read:

The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, according to law, and the cost of said building, exclusive of the site, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of one and one-half million dollars; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall not approve any plan or plans for said building the cost of which will exceed, when completed, the said sum of one and one-half million dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I shall move certain amendments at the suggestion of the committee. The bill is not complete without them. In section 1, line 3, after the word "to," I move to strike out the words "vest in the Government of the United States a complete title to the entire" and insert "quiet title to additional property in the;" so as to read:

That in order to quiet title to additional property in the block or square upon which stands the United States custom-house, in the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. LODGE. Has the unfinished business been laid before the Senate, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not. The Chair now lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution declaratory of the sense of the Senate as to the proper action to be taken by the President in regard to the lien or mortgage of the Government on the properties of the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the situation has very materially changed since we were discussing this resolution last spring. The object of the resolution was to secure the payment to the Government of the total amount of the debt due by these railroads. That has been accomplished, I am happy to say, so far as the main line of the Union Pacific Railroad is concerned, and the President has indicated his wishes in regard to the unfinished portion of that transaction. There is now before the Pacific Railroads Committee an amendment prepared by the Attorney-General. I therefore desire to move to recommit the pending resolution to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, in order that the whole subject may come up in proper form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion submitted by the Senator from Kansas to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. GEAR. I have no objection to the wish of the Senator from Kansas that this resolution be recommitted, but I think I may say that too much credit can not be given to the present Administration for the manner in which the debt of the Union Pacific Railroad Company has been adjusted, the country having acquired $13,000,000 more than would have been acquired under the arrangement of the former Administration.

As to what may be done regarding the Kansas Pacific of course I am not yet aware. Certainly, in so far as I am concerned, I do not think the Government should take any steps to purchase that property.

Mr. HARRIS. Before the motion to recommit is put, I desire to congratulate the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] on the change which has come over the spirit of his dream in regard to the matter. I think I ought also to be permitted to congratulate the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] upon his having discovered that there is a great deal of sympathy behind that movement other than that of the rabble and of the prejudiced persons to whom he referred last spring.

Mr. GEAR. I wish to say, in reply to my friend from Kansas, that I am very glad to accept congratulations on the outcome in the case of the Union Pacific, but no change has come over the spirit of my dream regarding the Government ownership and management of railroads.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, challenged, as I am, by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS], I desire to state that my successful efforts in defeating the passage of the Senator's resolution at the last session of Congress have brought to the Government of the United States full payment for all of its claims, and, in my judgment, had my efforts at the last session been unsuccessful, had the resolution proposed by the Senator been adopted, had this whole matter been left by the direction of the Senate for further continuances in court, the people of the United States would never have received anything like a full payment of the Government claim.

The result has demonstrated the wisdom of the course which I proposed and advocated at the last session, and that is that wherever the United States deals with property as a lien holder, it deal with it in that capacity and not its capacity as a sovereign; that wherever it has a claim against a railroad, it submit that claim to the adjudication of the courts the same as any other holder of a claim against private property; that wherever it desires to realize upon a claim against private property, whether it be railroad or any other kind of property, it do as a private suitor must do under the law, put that property up before the general public for sale to the highest bidder and take what the market will give for it.

Fortunately, Mr. President, under a Republican Administration the conditions of the country have so far improved that a property, which was not worth anywhere near the amount it recently sold for, has brought, and can probably earn returns upon, a purchase price adequate to the entire extinguishment of the Government claim.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to know if, in the Senator's opinion, the same magnificent change of value which has taken place in regard to the main line has also been carried out and has reached down into Kansas and will cover the property of the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company, which is still to be disposed of?

Mr. THURSTON. God forbid that I should take upon myself responsibility for the condition of things in Kansas. [Laughter.] It will be a long time before the same measure of prosperity reaches that State which has reached other portions of our country.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator mean to say that Nebraska is in a better situation politically, financially, or morally than Kansas?

Mr. THURSTON. I do not care to raise any distinction here between the political or moral conditions of Kansas and Nebraska; but fortunately for the State of Nebraska, the railroad of the Union Pacific constitutes a part of a great transcontinental line, which is, and which will remain forever, the one principal transcontinental line of the United States. The same improvement in the conditions of the country which has brought a vast amount of transcontinental business to that great through line and greatly enhanced its value can not be expected to occur with respect to a branch line down in the State of Kansas far to one side of the general transcontinental route.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I rose to announce that I have accomplished the object that I set out to accomplish at the last session of Congress. I have seen the Union Pacific, which has been a great matter of political contention in the State that I have the honor to represent, closed out at public sale for a sum that has paid the Government of the United States every cent that was its due; I have seen it in that way removed from the domain of politics and returned to the domain of private business, where the railroad traffic of this country rightfully belongs.

The other Pacific roads have no near or intimate relation to the affairs of my State. I have not for them or in them that personal or local interest that I had in the matter of the disposition of the Union Pacific. That property will now take its place among the great lines of the country. I have no doubt that, being relieved from its Government relations, it will add in its operations greatly to the benefit and the welfare of the people I represent. What becomes of the Central Pacific road or what becomes of the Kansas Pacific is a matter, of course, in which I have the same general interest as any other citizen of the United States, but I no longer have for the Pacific Railway situation any local or personal interest that rises above that which every other citizen ought to possess.

I have one suggestion, however, to make. I notice that the President of the United States is committed in his message to the policy of purchasing 394 miles of the railway line in Kansas unless a better bid than he suggests in his message is made for the property at the time of the sale. My suggestion is this: I do not believe as a Republican, I do not believe as a citizen of the United States, in the policy of Government ownership and operation of railway lines; and even if I did, the experiment can be better tried with some other property than with the 394 miles of the Kansas Pacific road.

Therefore I suggest to the Committee on Pacific Railroads that in any proposed legislation looking to the appropriation of money for the purpose of buying in the 394 miles of the Kansas Pacific at public sale, power be also conferred upon the Executive of the United States to resell the property under such terms and conditions as the committee may see fit. For, Mr. President, if we buy in those 394 miles of the Kansas Pacific road, without there being authority in the President or in the executive branch of this Government to resell the property, we shall place ourselves in the position of being compelled to operate that property by the United States until there can be further legislation of Congress, and in the meantime we shall be fully committed to the proposition of Government ownership and operation of railway lines.

All Senators who believe in that as a proper function of government, of course, will wish to have this line bought, and, being bought, will wish to have it remain in charge and operation of the Government; and knowing how difficult it is to secure affirmative action by legislation in the Congress of the United States, I look forward to obstruction, to difficulties, and probably to defeat of any legislation looking to a resale of the Kansas Pacific by the Government to private parties once it becomes the property of the United States.

Therefore, Mr. President, while I am entirely willing, for my part, to join the Executive and to join the committee in any legislation which will help to secure the greatest possible price for the Kansas Pacific aided line, I hope that the committee, in proposing such legislation, will couple with it a wise and adequate provision whereby the United States can dispose of the railroad after it has become its purchaser.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] to recommit Senate resolution 125 to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. LODGE. I move to take up Order of Business 14, being the bill (S. 112) to amend the immigration laws of the United States. I desire simply to make the bill the unfinished business; and I shall then be ready to give way to a motion to adjourn, or, if any Senator desires to call up any other bill, I will readily give way.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Colorado will allow me to get up the bill, I will then yield to him.

Mr. TELLER. I am willing that the Senator be permitted to get up his bill, and have it made a special order.

Mr. LODGE. I want to get it up first, and then I will yield to the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 112) to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. Now I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to allow the pending bill to be informally laid aside.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I will agree very readily to laying it aside. I do not desire to press it this afternoon in any event.

MRS. JULIA A. HUMPHRIES.

Mr. TELLER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2177) for the relief of Mrs. Julia A. Humphries, a bill which passed the Senate at the last Congress and which has been several times favorably reported in both bodies.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Mrs. Julia A. Humphries $5,215, as a full indemnification for property taken by the United States Army for hospital purposes at Fredericksburg, Va., and for damages suffered at the hands of the Union forces, and for services rendered as hospital nurse during the war of 1861.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TWELFTH AND SUBSEQUENT CENSUSES.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to ask unanimous consent for an agreement that the unfinished business, the immigration bill, be temporarily laid aside when the Senate convenes on Monday for the purpose of taking up the bill (S. 94) to provide for the Twelfth and subsequent censuses. It is important that that bill should be passed at the earliest practicable date because of the provision it contains looking to subsequent action during the present session perfecting legislation for the purpose of taking the census. I conceive that the bill can be disposed of on Monday; if not, it certainly can be on Tuesday; but I will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that if it becomes obvious on Tuesday that the bill will involve a protracted discussion, it can after Tuesday be laid aside and the regular order of business thereafter be proceeded with.

Mr. LODGE. I can only say that personally I shall not press the regular order of business on Monday or on Tuesday if the debate on the census bill shall continue so long. Of course I can make no further agreement, but certainly to that I will myself very gladly agree.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the order of business?

Mr. CARTER. The order of business does not appear on the printed Calendar. The bill was recommitted to the Committee on Census and reported this morning from that committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not ask the consideration of the bill on Monday until we get it in print and see what it contains. It is a very important measure which ought to be acted upon. I agree fully with that, but we ought to have an opportunity to read the bill and see what are its provisions.

Mr. CARTER. I will state to the Senator that no change of any considerable consequence has been made in the bill as reported at the last or extraordinary session of Congress.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest to the Senator that he call up his bill on Tuesday.

Mr. CARTER. At the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the immigration bill may be temporarily laid aside on Tuesday, instead of Monday, I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

Mr. LODGE. If the immigration bill is not sooner disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], that on Tuesday next, if not sooner disposed of, the unfinished business, being Senate bill 112, known as the immigration bill, may be temporarily laid aside, in order that consideration may be given to Senate bill 94, to provide for the Twelfth and subsequent censuses? The Chair hears no objection, and that will be the order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 13, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 9, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Journal will be considered as approved.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I think the Journal is incorrect in stating that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures was given leave to sit during the sessions of the House. I think it was the Committee on Banking and Currency.

A MEMBER. It was.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made. The notes of the Journal Clerk show that it was the Committee on Banking and Currency. If there be no objection the Journal will be considered as approved.

There was no objection.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following resolution from the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be authorized to have printed and bound whatever documents and papers may be necessary for the use of said committee during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, we might as well understand this matter. I have no objection in the world to the committee printing any paper that pertains to any hearing before the committee, but under that resolution the latitude is so great that it seems to me the committee might print whatever it chose to. I hesitated about objecting to the consideration of the resolution which was agreed to yesterday, giving the Committee on Banking and Currency the privilege of printing. I think under that resolution the committee can print everything that has been said about this roving, indefinite, and unknown currency commission organized down at Indianapolis. I do not believe that the printing privilege of the House ought to be made to include any such things as that.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that this is the usual resolution, and quite a number of similar resolutions were passed on Tuesday, on motion of the chairmen of the various committees.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that.

Mr. PERKINS. The printing under these resolutions is limited, as I understand, to $500 a session.

Mr. BAILEY. I perfectly understand that there is a limitation on the amount, but there is no limitation on the character of the documents which it may print. I am not going to interpose any objection in this case.

The SPEAKER. This is a report from the Committee on Printing, and the Chair understands it to be a privileged report.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I think it is not a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PERKINS. It is a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe that under this the committee can have any printing done that it sees fit. I believe that no committee under this general leave ought to be permitted to print anything except a recital of the transactions of the committee. I do not believe that we should permit to any committee the privilege of having printed anything that in the judgment of the chairman should be printed.

Mr. LOUD. I would suggest to the gentleman that this resolution should be made to conform to the form of the usual resolution.

Mr. PERKINS. It does.

Mr. LOUD. I beg to differ with the gentleman. This gives leave to print any such matter as they may deem necessary. Let the resolution when adopted confine the committee to printing such matter as shall come before that committee and the hearings before that committee. This gives unlimited power to the committee to have printed such matter as it desires.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, no. There is no unlimited power to print under this resolution.

Mr. LOUD. What objection can there be to confining it to the terms of the usual resolution?

Mr. PERKINS. I understand this is the usual resolution, precisely such as were passed here on Tuesday, on the motion of the various chairmen of committees, without any reference to the committee whatever.

Mr. LOUD. I think the gentleman will discover, if he looks at those resolutions that the various committees had passed, that in every one of them the language differed from the authority given to this committee. This gives to the committee unlimited power, and the usual resolution confines the committee to the printing of hearings before the committee.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, no!

Mr. LOUD. I appeal to the resolutions themselves.

Mr. PERKINS. I think the gentleman will find that this is the usual form, and agrees with the language of the resolutions passed on Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order. This is a matter of some importance, and might become a matter of more importance.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me a late day to raise this question. These resolutions have been regularly passed in the beginning of each session of Congress during my experience, and it is a matter of importance to the committees having hearings, and for the ready dispatch of their business, so far as the printing is concerned. Now, the Committee on Naval Affairs had this resolution referred to the Committee on Printing. The other chairmen of committees on Tuesday rose on the floor and asked for themselves this privilege of the House, and it was granted in each case without question. I can see no reason why the issue should be made on the Committee on Naval Affairs and not upon the other committees.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield to me a sufficient length of time to have this resolution read in comparison with the resolutions adopted on Tuesday? Say the resolution adopted on the request of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads or the Committee on the Judiciary. They are in the RECORD; let us have them read.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman is probably familiar with his own resolution; but I am speaking generally.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be authorized to have printed and bound whatever documents and papers may be necessary for the use of said committee during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by the said committee during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Mr. LOUD. That is the usual form, I will say to the gentleman, of these resolutions.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not see any particular distinction between the two resolutions.

Mr. LOUD. There may be a distinction without any difference; but what objection can there be to having this resolution confined to the same power to print as is given to other committees?

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman from California desires it, I have no objection to the language being modified so as to conform to the resolution just read.

Mr. LOUD. That is the only object I have.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I will take it upon myself to sanction the amendment the gentleman from California proposes.

Mr. LOUD. They will all be uniform then, and they will all have the same privilege. I do not object to the Committee on Naval Affairs having power to have printing done, but they should all have the same power.

Mr. PERKINS. I have no objection to the resolution being modified.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. PERKINS. Let it read so that it will conform to the resolution last read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by the said committee during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Mr. PERKINS. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That is precisely the form of the resolution passed on behalf of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. PERKINS. Precisely.

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment, and the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. ASHLEY B. WRIGHT, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS NO. 3.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 3 be, and hereby is, authorized to have printed and bound such documents and papers, for the use of said committee, as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by said committee during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offer another resolution, which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 3 be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House.

The resolution was adopted.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by said committee.

The resolution was adopted.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Pacific Railroads to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Railroads be authorized to procure the printing and binding of such papers and documents pertaining to business before it as it deems necessary in the discharge of its duties during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the general pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill No. 4303, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeds, I wish to ask him what length of time he proposes to take upon this bill and if he desires now to fix any limit to the general debate?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I think we had better go along for a while and see how the debate runs. Several members have asked for time, and I do not think it would be wise to undertake to limit the debate until we see what the temper of the House is.

Mr. Chairman, this bill appropriates in the main item $140,000,000 to cover disbursements for pensions. This is the same amount that was appropriated last year. It is the amount estimated by the Secretary of the Interior and concurred in by the Commissioner of Pensions. The committee found nothing to justify a reduction, and accordingly they have recommended that this amount be appropriated for the next fiscal year.

The next item in the bill is for the compensation of the examining surgeons, who are paid by fees. The Commissioner of Pensions, who appeared before the committee, did not think it proper that this amount should be limited or reduced.

The next item is for the salaries of agents. Those salaries are fixed by law, and the committee, of course, could not make any reduction in that item. Therefore they report the same amount that has been carried for the item ever since the salaries of the agents were fixed by law—$72,000.

The committee recommend a reduction of $30,000 in the estimate for clerk hire in agencies. Going over the amounts paid to clerks in the different agencies, we found that the chief clerks were paid $2,000 per year each, while a number of other clerks were paid $1,800. By reducing the salaries of the chief clerks to $1,500 a year and reducing to a thousand dollars the salaries of other clerks now paid more, we save a reduction of something over $30,000; and this the committee recommend, believing that even with this reduction the clerks in these agencies will be receiving quite as much as other clerks elsewhere are paid for similar work. The committee recommend this reduction and an appropriation for this item of $400,000. The next two items are for fuel and lights. They are small, one being $250 and the other $500, and we could not make any reduction in those items.

In the matter of rents the present Commissioner has made a reduction to $16,080. That is the amount paid at present in rents, and the committee recommend the appropriation of that sum. This is a reduction from the estimate of nearly or quite $4,000.

In the matter of stationery we recommend an appropriation of $30,000, a reduction of $5,000 from the estimate.

This, Mr. Chairman, is all there is of this bill, and unless gentlemen desire to ask some questions concerning it, I will not occupy further the time of the committee.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether there is any new legislation in this pension appropriation bill?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. There is not.

Mr. CONNOLLY. No new provisions of law?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. None whatever. Now, Mr. Chairman, if there are no further questions I reserve the balance of my time and yield so much of it to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] as he desires.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am familiar with the provisions of this bill and am in harmony with the recommendation of the committee that it do pass. I do not desire to discuss it, as I think members generally are familiar with it, but I avail myself of this opportunity to call the attention of the House and the country to the estimate submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury for the public service for the coming fiscal year, for the purpose of disabusing the minds of members touching those estimates, as well as for information to the country when we come to compare the estimates for the coming year with the estimates submitted in former years for the public service.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report and in the estimated appropriations submitted to Congress, estimates the total expenditures for 1899, exclusive of the sinking fund, at $504,522,533.22.

He estimates the revenues of the Government for 1899, including postal receipts, at $482,874,647.37, thus estimating an apparent deficit in the revenues for 1899 of $21,647,885.85.

In arriving at the sum of $504,522,533.22, estimated expenditures for 1899, the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to the law enacted last session, includes $48,728,160.56 for rivers and harbors. Of this amount, the sum of $33,113,486 is for work based on surveys of the Engineer Department. These works have not been authorized by law; and works of this character have not heretofore been included as a part of the annual expenditures of the Government; if their estimated cost be deducted from the sum total of the estimates for 1899, the whole estimated expenses would amount to only $471,209,047.22. The estimated revenues are $482,874,647.37; and instead of a deficit, there would be an estimated surplus over expenditures of $8,334,399.85.

In the estimates submitted to Congress for the current fiscal year, 1898, by the last Administration, nothing was submitted for river and harbor works based on engineers' surveys; and for certain river and harbor works authorized to be placed under contract, only $5,249,000 was included, whereas, by a note in the Book of Estimates, Congress was advised that the further sum of $17,529,053.16 would be required to meet contracts authorized by law. Had the latter sum been added, as it should have been, to the estimated expenditures, it would have revealed an estimated deficit under the then existing revenue laws of $63,248,023.76.

The following is the provision of law enacted by Senate amendment on the last sundry civil act, under which the Secretary of the Treasury has increased the estimates of expenditures for 1899 by $33,313,486 for works not heretofore treated as a part of the annual expenditures of the Government:

> And hereafter the Secretary of War shall annually submit estimates in detail for river and harbor improvements required for the ensuing fiscal year to the Secretary of the Treasury to be included in, and carried into the sum total of, the Book of Estimates.

With reference to these estimates, the Secretary of War says, in a note in the estimates:

> The foregoing schedule of river and harbor improvements, prepared under the direction of the Chief of Engineers, is transmitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury in compliance with the provisions of law (30 Statutes, page 48), making it mandatory upon the Secretary of War to furnish such estimates, and requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to include the same in the sum total of the Book of Estimates.
> It is not believed that appropriations are necessary at this time for all of the objects included in the schedule submitted, but in order to avoid discrimination the list of objects as presented by the Chief of Engineers has not been curtailed. The entire subject of river and harbor improvements has been fully considered by me, and my recommendations, based upon such consideration, will be found in my annual report, to which attention is invited in this connection.
> R. A. ALGER, Secretary of War.
> WAR DEPARTMENT, October 19, 1897.

The Secretary of War fully discusses these estimates in his annual report, page 41, as follows:

> The estimates for river and harbor improvements submitted by the Chief of Engineers have been prepared in accordance with the requirements of law. (Acts of June 23, 1866; March 2, 1867, and June 4, 1897, quoted by him.) They greatly exceed former estimates, and, while I hesitate to express an opinion in matters so fully within the knowledge of members of Congress, I can not refrain from stating the result of my observations since my connection with the Department. It is true that I have not had an opportunity to make a personal inspection of many of the works in question, yet with the exception of waterways and harbors where there is a large traffic, or where immediate improvement is imperatively needed, I am convinced that the estimates are largely in excess of what they should be at a time when the demands upon the Treasury are as great as now. It is therefore recommended that the amount to be appropriated be largely reduced below the estimates. It is but just to the Chief of Engineers to state that these estimates were made by my direction, that the facts might be placed before Congress, showing what the expenditures would be were all the requirements of the above-cited laws complied with.
> Special attention is invited to the fact that there are now continuous contracts outstanding that will require an expenditure of over $17,000,000 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899; of over $14,000,000 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900; $5,700,000 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901; $796,000 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and $345,000 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903. It is to be understood that these statements are of course approximate only, but they are believed to be nearly correct.

Now, while what I have stated explains for purposes of comparison the estimates of this year as compared with the estimates of former years, I may say further that the necessity for legislation appeared to both the House and the Senate at the last session of Congress. To particularize, there was over $17,000,000, in round numbers, that the Government was bound for under contracts by existing law. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carlisle, last year omitted that item of $17,000,000 from the estimates, although he did state in the Book of Estimates, as a matter of information for Congress, that such and such laws had been passed which would require such and such moneys to meet them. And there he dropped the matter. When Congress discovered this fact—discovered that the law and the necessities of the public service demanded that these appropriations should be made—it was provided by positive law, in the terms which I have read, that in the future the Secretary of the Treasury should submit in the estimates and carry into the totals all work required by law.

Our legislation went further and provided that even where surveys had been authorized by Congress upon the part of the engineers of the Army touching public works and estimates made for the same, although those estimates and surveys might never be vitalized by law, they, too, should be included in the estimates. Therefore the estimates have been made in pursuance of this law, as well as the estimates for all expenditures heretofore required by law touching contract work. Thus we have estimates of $33,000,000 pending here upon surveys that may or may not be vitalized by legislation, and many of which I apprehend will never be vitalized. These help to swell the aggregate.

It is proper that at the commencement of this session attention should be called to this matter. I would state again that if the estimates for the coming year were made as they were made in former years, they would show, instead of an estimated deficit of over $21,000,000, a surplus of over $8,000,000 in excess of the estimated expenditures.

Having said this much, I want to say another thing about the estimated expenditures for the coming fiscal year and our appropriations. In my judgment the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury is conservative as to the revenues which we shall receive next year under the existing law, and upon those estimates we shall have a surplus of $8,000,000. It is my duty, however, to call the attention of the House to the fact that there may be an expenditure for pensions for the coming fiscal year greater than he estimates. The appropriations for the current year are $140,000,000; the estimate for the coming year, as submitted by the Secretary of the Interior, for the payment of pensions, is $140,000,000—the same amount. Now, the Commissioner of Pensions, in the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, gave it as his opinion that there would be required for the fiscal year 1899, $148,000,000 to pay pensions, instead of $140,000,000. In this he may be mistaken. He thinks that he is reasonably certain about the matter; but it will be seen at once that it is a matter of calculation, and that the actual results will depend upon the fidelity with which the pension laws are administered, upon the promptitude with which the work is done and the claims disposed of as they are ready for disposition, and also upon the deaths which may occur of those upon the pension rolls.

Now, this matter being considered by the Secretary of the Interior in connection with the Commissioner of Pensions has resulted in the recommendation for $140,000,000 for this coming year for the payment of pensions, as embodied in the pending bill. Although, Mr. Chairman, I state again that the Commissioner of Pensions is of opinion that it will require some $8,000,000 more for that purpose, we only recommend $140,000,000, for the reason that that sum, in any event, will pay the pensions for over eleven months of the coming fiscal year, and Congress will have again met and adjourned, as its term expires before there could be any possible deficiency in the event that there shall be any.

I am the more willing to take the estimate of the Secretary of the Interior when I recollect that there are times when the Departments of the Government are mistaken touching these great expenditures, and especially with reference to the amount required for pensions. I recollect very well in the Forty-seventh Congress that the estimates called for $60,000,000 in excess of what was expended in the then coming fiscal year; and Congress appropriated the whole amount. Thereafter that much was covered into the Treasury. I recollect also that our friends on the then other side of the House, after having obtained power, reappropriated that sum of $60,000,000, and thereby made a seeming saving of $60,000,000, as compared with the appropriations of the preceding Congress.

I believe, sir, in giving all money necessary to carry on the Government and pay all pensions; but there is no possible danger, even if the money carried by this bill shall not be sufficient to pay all pensions for the coming fiscal year, of the pensioner having to await payment of his pension after it is payable. Fourteen months from this time, after almost two-thirds of the coming fiscal year has expired, Congress will be in session, and by deficiency appropriation will provide any shortage that may perchance occur.

Now, upon the theory that $148,000,000 may be required instead of $140,000,000 that the bill carries for pensions, I call the attention of the House and the country to the fact that the additional $8,000,000 for pensions, if required at all, along with other items for the public service now authorized by law, will, in round numbers, exhaust the anticipated eight millions of surplus to arise from the revenues for the next fiscal year. And, in conclusion, having made this explanation, perhaps it may not be amiss for me to say to gentlemen on this side of the House, as well as on the other side, under existing conditions, with anticipatory imports prior to the enactment of the present revenue law, with a growing country and increasing public service, that it is our duty to look well to the appropriations that we enact during this session of Congress, and see to it that while the public service is sufficiently supplied with money to carry it on, no dollar shall be appropriated that is not absolutely demanded by the best interests of the public service. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, unless some gentleman on the other side of the House desires to occupy some time now—there is nobody who desires to speak on our side at the present time.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I commend what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has just said about the necessity for great caution against unnecessary or extravagant appropriations. He shall have my hearty cooperation in his efforts to keep down extravagance.

I listened with some interest to the statement made by him in which he estimates what the probable appropriations and receipts of the Government will be for the next fiscal year. And although he and I both get our figures from the same estimates, sent us by the Secretary of the Treasury, we differ very widely in the conclusions reached.

I hold in my hand a statement made up from the estimates to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, which shows the total estimates for regular and permanent annual appropriations for the fiscal year of 1899 to be $555,552,533.22. Now subtract from this the total estimated revenues of the Government for 1899, amounting to $482,874,647.37, and it leaves an excess of estimated appropriations over estimated revenues of $72,677,885.85.

This is exclusive of deficiencies and miscellaneous appropriations, which we know are always sure to come, and which will greatly swell this deficiency. I make the prediction that in the estimates sent us by the Secretary of the Treasury he has overestimated the revenues and underestimated the appropriations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am sure I can demonstrate from the bill under consideration that the Departments are not sending us estimates of the amounts they expect to spend. Everyone knows who knows anything about it, that the Pension Department will spend fully $10,000,000 more than the estimates sent us by the Secretary of the Treasury call for.

Just let me explain. This bill, made up from the estimates of the Secretary of the Interior, appropriates $140,000,000 for pensions, when the Commissioner of Pensions in the hearing before the subcommittee stated that it would require $150,000,000.

The Commissioner stated to us that there would be a deficiency this year of about $8,500,000. He stated, also, that the roll of pensioners and disbursements from the office were increasing and would continue to increase through the year 1899, and yet we are only appropriating for the next year what was appropriated for this, with an $8,500,000 deficiency for this year staring us in the face.

It is true, over two millions of that came over as a deficiency from last year, and the certificates were held up and paid out of the appropriation for the current fiscal year. Now, unless it be true, as charged by some, that the exigencies of the campaign in Ohio made the pension disbursements larger for the last few months than the others in proportion, we have no reason to believe that there is going to be any falling off in the other months.

Here is what the Pension Commissioner said before the subcommittee, in making up this bill, about the money really required. The chairman asked him:

Now we can begin on the question of the amount. The first item we see is for the general appropriation for Army and Navy pensions. The estimate for 1899 is $140,000,000, and the appropriation for the last three years has been $140,000,000, and you estimate the same amount this year?

Mr. EVANS. Well, my estimate is $148,337,000. If it runs as it does now, it will come near $150,000,000.

What reason has anybody to suspect it will not run as it does now? The only change probable is that it will run faster, because the Commissioner told us it was growing all the time and had not reached the maximum. I read further from the statements of the Pension Commissioner before our committee.

When asked how it came about that the estimates sent us were so much less than he had estimated the Department would spend, he answered:

Mr. EVANS. The Secretary of the Interior thought we had better make the same estimate. But I have got the figures here on which I base my estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you going to take the position we ought to appropriate $148,000,000, or are you satisfied to let us appropriate the amount named by the Secretary?

Mr. EVANS. Well, you are going to have a deficiency this year, and you know that just as well as I do. We had a deficiency last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question right at the outstart is, What attitude will we be placed in with a bill which proposes more than the Secretary of the Interior estimates?

Mr. BELDEN. I am in favor of asking the clerk to ask the Secretary of the Interior if he made that estimate on what he knows to be the basis, and if he has cut it down.

Mr. EVANS. I will frankly tell you so. Now, we were short $2,500,000——

Mr. BELDEN. That only makes it worse if we keep hiding it.

This dialogue went on some time. Finally the Commissioner said:

I will say to you frankly in my estimates here I am just telling you the facts, and you gentlemen and the Secretary understand it, that there will be a deficiency this year which you will have to meet in your second session.

Mr. BELDEN. In other words, we are hiding our heads and helping to cover up this thing as much as we can, and we are not telling the truth?

Mr. EVANS. Well, I present the figures there on which I base my estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true, but what are we going to do?

Mr. EVANS. The Secretary and myself discussed that question, and he thought we had better estimate for the same amount and let it be covered in a deficiency.

Now, here is all the point to this thing. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELDEN], for whose painful accident we are all very sorry, says, there is no use in hiding our heads. Of course, you might tide over this matter until after the next Congressional election, but then you would be caught up with. You might just as well face the thing. I do not want to increase the appropriation myself, but the laws under which you are operating and the pensions that are to be paid under those laws are going to require more money; and there is no good purpose, as Mr. BELDEN said there, in hiding it out and not telling the truth about it, and keeping the public from knowing what you are spending as compared with your revenues.

Why, my friends and fellow-citizens [laughter], when we met here last spring in extra session, how often did the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, tell us that we were confronted by an awful condition of things—did not have revenue sufficient to meet the expenditures of the Government; and he charged the wicked Democrats with having brought about that condition of things. Congress, he said, was brought up here in extra session to remedy it. What has been the result? The expenditures have been increasing and the revenues have greatly decreased since the passage of the Dingley bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not care what you asked the gentleman from Maine during the extra session; I do not care what proposition was made to do anything, the gentleman, with that placid Maine smile of his, would get up and say, "This session was just called for the purpose of making a bill that would produce revenue to meet the expenses of the Government."

Now, I have not gone over the estimates for other Departments, but with this deficiency for next year, amounting to $72,000,000, already shown, if it be true that we are hiding out eight or ten million dollars in every bill like this pension bill, there is no telling where this thing will go to and no telling what will happen. Why, we shall have to have another extra session, I am afraid, next spring, to have Chairman DINGLEY tell us about the condition of the country and wanting another bill to raise revenue.

Mr. Chairman, I naturally feel some delicacy in discussing the question of pensions on account of the conspicuous part played by me in producing this pension roll. [Laughter.] You know it has been charged that the war was protracted at least two years by reason of my connection with the Confederate army. I really think this is an exaggeration. I do not think it would have closed more than a year or a year and half earlier if I had not been there at all.

But I feel somewhat emboldened to make some remarks on the general subject of pensions without incurring the charge of a want of patriotism, because President McKinley, in the message he sent us the other day, evidently had me in his mind when he wrote this:

> A matter of genuine satisfaction is the growing feeling of fraternal regard and unification of all sections of our country, the incompleteness of which has too long delayed realization of the highest blessings of the Union. The spirit of patriotism is universal and is ever increasing in fervor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in a good-natured sort of way, without, I trust, provoking anybody to fight the war over again, I desire to submit some figures I have compiled, showing the extent to which this pension business has gone.

I find that there were on the 1st day of July, this year, on the pension rolls 976,014 pensioners, and that there are pending more than 600,000 applications unadjudicated. These applications are, many of them, for original pensions, many for increases of pension, and some for reinstatement on the rolls, and there are hundreds of new applications being filed every day.

Notwithstanding the war has been over more than thirty-two years, the pension roll is larger now than ever before, and growing larger every day. I find that there have been pensioned 1,424,940 pensioners on account of the civil war. I find that this Government has paid out in pensions since the close of the war over $2,100,000,000, and that now we are paying out every day nearly half of the entire revenue of this great Government for pensions; that we are paying more than twice as much, from the best information I can gather, as all the rest of the nations of the world; that France maintains a standing army of more than half a million of men for about two-thirds of what our pensioners cost us, and that Russia maintains a standing army of almost 1,000,000 of men at a less cost than our pension roll.

These, Mr. Chairman, are startling figures, and are, it seems to me, enough to excite the thoughtful attention of those who have this question to deal with. I know this expenditure has gone a long ways beyond the expectations of the devoted leaders of the old soldiers, when their deeds of sacrifice and heroism were all fresh in their minds. I had occasion once before to call attention to the statement made by General Garfield on the pension appropriation bill twenty-one years ago.

Speaking on this floor on the 7th day of December, 1876, discussing a bill that carried $28,533,000, he said:

> My idea is, if gentlemen will allow me, that we have reached, and perhaps passed, the summit of appropriations for this object. It took a number of years to develop and get through with regular form of laws to admit to the rolls the persons entitled to pensions, and the time must necessarily come when we shall pass the climax and begin to go downward. I suppose we have already reached the maximum.

How startling then would have been the proposition, if the human mind could have conceived it, that confronts us to-day? Twenty-one years after that the summit has not been reached, although the appropriations are more than five times as great as that about which he spoke.

Mr. Chairman, I have been hearing about the maximum ever since I came to Congress, although I came nine years after General Garfield spoke about the maximum. We do not seem to be any nearer the summit now than we have seemed to be all along. I remember on the discussion of this bill in the Fifty-first Congress, Mr. Morrow, who had charge of the bill, predicted we would reach the maximum in 1894.

This is the close of 1897, and the Commissioner of Pensions assures me that I will have to come back to Congress again before I ever see the maximum reached. I know that a great many brave soldiers who fought for the Union believe it is time to call a halt. Many of them in and out of this House have said as much to me. I think I represent fairly the feeling and temper of the Southern people and the ex-Confederate soldiers on this question. We recognize the fact that the Government is going to do the proper thing by the soldiers who fought its battles, and that proper thing is to make good as far as possible with pecuniary aid to the soldier during his lifetime such disabilities and injuries as he may have received by reason of his services in line of duty and to those dependent on him after his death during such condition of dependence.

Recognizing this obligation of the Government, we would pay our portion of such a reasonable sum without complaint. But that the thing has gone far beyond reason, we do not think any fair-minded man will dispute. We pay our taxes under adverse circumstances. Almost none of this money is distributed in our midst, and while the pensioner gets his pay in money that will buy twice as much as it would buy when most of the laws conferring these pensions were passed, we pay our portion of it with products that do not bring us more than one-third of what they brought when these laws were passed.

So you see that while the pension rolls have been growing larger and the number of dollars it takes to pay them doubling up year by year, the value of those dollars has also been doubling, and the hardships of the men who pay them and get no benefits in return have also been doubling. Mr. Chairman, the old, crippled Confederate soldiers, some of them plowing in the fields on wooden legs to make cotton at 4½ cents a pound, are helping to pay this pension roll.

We in the South did not have the benefit of any famine abroad to stimulate the price of cotton—that, you know, does not affect cotton—and while we do not envy the wheat growers the benefits that have come to them from the foreign famine, we get no such benefit ourselves, but, on the contrary, the gold standard is mercilessly beating down the price of our commodities.

The poor laboring people—those who are striking for wages that will enable them to buy bread—help to pay these pensions. They do not ask that the pensions be abolished, but is it too much for them to ask that they be made reasonable?

Mr. Chairman, since the inauguration of the era of McKinley prosperity, of which we have heard so much, the depreciation this year in the cotton crop of the Southern States is more than $100,000,000. It is not to be wondered at, Mr. Chairman, that this condition of things should have impressed a little Georgia girl, of whose prayer I heard as I came on to Washington. In concluding her prayer, after praying for her father and mother, brothers, sisters, and friends, the preacher, the Sunday-school teacher, and the heathen, she said: "And now, O Lord, take good care of Yourself, for You know You and McKinley are all we've got to depend on, and it don't look like McKinley is going to do anything for us." [Laughter.] In her childlike simplicity, that little girl took in the situation pretty well. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, before closing I wish to call the attention of the committee to some suggestions for remedial legislation made to us by the Commissioner of Pensions. I think they are so reasonable they ought not to meet with a single objection on this floor. He recommends the passage of an act that will prevent widows of soldiers who marry after this time from drawing a pension. This is the law now, so far as the pensioners under the act of 1890, known as the dependent-pension act, are concerned, but the most of the pensioners are under other laws.

There are a great many old soldiers, some in soldiers' homes and many outside of them, who are the recipients of pensions, and young women, in order to become pensioners, go and take advantage of these old fellows and marry them. [Laughter.]

They marry them, in a great many cases, merely for the purpose of getting the pension. Of course I do not say there are no exceptions to this, but I do say that that is the inducement in a great many instances, and in such a case the young wife is more interested in the death of her husband than in his life, because when he dies she goes upon the pension rolls. There are 7 survivors of the war of 1812, and more than 2,800 widows of the survivors of that war, or more than 400 widows for each survivor. [Laughter.] There are several widows of the war of the Revolution still on the pension rolls.

Gentlemen, if you do not do something to stop this business you will have, seventy-five years hence, hundreds of thousands of widows of soldiers of the war of the rebellion still on your pension roll. There is no telling how many you will have, because they "go on forever." [Laughter.] The old soldier—the man for whose benefit the pension was intended—dies, but the young widow, with a good substantial pension behind her—there is no telling how long she will live. [Laughter.]

We owe it to posterity to stop this evil. The Commissioner also called our attention to some things that should be stopped under the arrearages act to widows and minors. For instance, this law authorizes a widow to file her application and draw a pension from the time of the death of her husband, although the husband may never have been a pensioner. The Commissioner gave us several instances illustrating the wrongs that can be done under this law. I remember one instance in which an officer died in 1871, never having applied for a pension. In 1885 his widow married again, never having applied for a pension.

But now the ex-widow comes in under the inspiration of her new husband or some pension attorney and applies for a pension from the time her husband died up to the time she married again, which amounts in this particular case to more than $3,800. So that the pension that was intended for the benefit of the soldier during his life, if he claimed it, or to take care of his widow after his death and during her widowhood, is used to set the successor of the husband up in business.

Now, the proposition is to amend this law so as to provide that the widow shall only be entitled to the pension from the time of the filing of her application, which application must be made during the time of her widowhood. We also learned that men 40 years old are now filing applications and getting pensions as minors.

That comes about in this way: A minor of a deceased soldier who never applied for any pension is now hunted up, probably by some pension attorney, and informed that twenty-five years ago he was entitled to a pension as a minor. Now, this pension was given to take care of him in his minority and keep him from want; but under the operation of the law he now gets this pension from the death of his father up to the time he was 16 years of age without any regard to his present circumstances or condition.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Did the Commissioner indicate how much these things expanded the pension roll?

Mr. ALLEN. He said he believed it was costing the Government $10,000 a day.

These abuses are greatly aggravated by the greed of some 80,000 attorneys who are said to be engaged in this pension business.

I think these evils might and should be corrected, and while I know the rules of the House do not permit us to legislate on appropriation bills, I am going, at the proper time, to offer an amendment that will correct these abuses, and ask unanimous consent to have it put on this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what I have said upon this subject has been said in the spirit, as the President puts it, of "fervent patriotism," and I do not want any battle-scarred sutler to get up here and accuse me of being an enemy of the Federal soldier. [Great laughter.] If he does, it will only develop further the differences in the Republican party. [Laughter.]

Here is our friend from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, at war with the President about the civil service; here is our friend from Indiana, Mr. JOHNSON, standing by the President on the civil-service law, but denouncing the fraudulent, nonsensical, bimetallic monetary commission which the President sent out last year, and we find our Republican friends all torn up and divided on the proposition as to what is to be done with the greenbacks and as to what is to be done with Cuba and Hawaii [laughter]; and now, if anybody undertakes to say that we ex-Confederates are not thoroughly imbued with the spirit of fervent patriotism, why he will have the President to fight on that proposition and only exhibit further differences in the Republican party. [Laughter.] I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, if there are other gentlemen on that side who desire to address the committee on this bill, I prefer that they do so now.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, it was my purpose to ask the attention of the Committee of the Whole for a short time to a discussion of this bill, but I am in doubt now whether I should do so, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] has spoken upon it so ably and so eloquently. That gentleman has the happy faculty of at once exhausting the subject and leaving the audience fresh and eager for more of the treat which he spreads before them.

The subject, Mr. Chairman, is one that deserves more attention than it has received. It has been much the fashion here to pass bills of this character as a mere matter of course, without stopping to consider whether they might be improved or whether there is anything in them deserving to be changed or eliminated.

This bill carries an appropriation of one hundred and forty and odd millions of dollars, equal to $2 from each man, woman, and child in these United States.

It is stated—and truly, I think—that according to the judgment of those best informed $150,000,000 will be required for pensions during the year covered by this appropriation bill.

I live in a section of the country, Mr. Chairman, where truly all the bitterness that the war may have engendered has passed away, and where peace and good will abide. It is a section where dwell a large number of persons who served in the Federal Army, and also a large number of those who saw service in the Confederacy. The sons and the daughters of Federal soldiers have intermarried with the daughters and the sons of Confederate soldiers, and the new generation born of this union hear with equal pleasure the story of the prowess of those who wore the blue and of those who wore the gray. And the grandsires frequently meet about the common hearthstone to discuss, in a spirit of fairness and peace and with charity toward all, the events of the war, recalling what redounds to the honor of American manhood and the glory of the American soldiery, and striving to soften and to forget all those things of the war times which are unpleasant in memory and therefore best forgotten.

Coming from this section of country, representing such people, I feel that if I voice properly what they think I shall not do harm to the nation or to the deserving soldier, nor offer any suggestion which shall deserve criticism as being hostile to any just interest in this great Republic.

It has seemed to me that, in addition to the classes mentioned by the eloquent gentleman from Mississippi who are drawing pensions and ought not to have them, there are some others to whom no allusion has been made thus far in the debate. Of course it seems to me, as it does to him, and, I take it, to every member of this House, that the widow of the soldier long dead, the widow of the soldier who asked no pension during his lifetime and who asked for none during her widowhood, is hardly upon any just principles entitled to a pension a quarter of a century after the death of her husband and after she has contracted an alliance with a new husband. But the law allows a pension under such circumstances.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I understand the law does not allow a pension to a soldier's widow who has married a second time.

Mr. DE ARMOND. My friend has misunderstood me. The law, as I understand, does not give a pension to a widow who has remarried from the date of the remarriage, but it does, as I understand, allow a pension to such a person, though remarried, from the date of the death of the first husband, the soldier, to the date of her remarriage. That, I think, is a correct statement.

The other widows referred to by the gentleman from Mississippi are those who were not the wives of soldiers during the time that veritably tried men's souls, but who, being in most instances comparatively young women, have married old soldiers long years after their battles were ended and when they were clearly marked for the early harvest of death. The law provides for pensioning these persons; but I think without injustice to any one—on the contrary, with absolute justice to all—such pensions might well be withheld by an amendment of the law.

The pension roll, as has been stated, is upon the increase. I will not discuss whether it ought to increase, but I will say it is remarkable that almost a third of a century after the close of the war the pension roll still is growing and the pension disbursements still are increasing. There are now upon this roll, according to the latest reports that we have, 976,014 pensioners. There has been in the past year an increase of 5,336 pensioners. There was paid out in the last year for pensions (saying nothing of about a million and a quarter of dollars disbursed for expenses in connection with the Pension Department) $139,799,242.12. This is an increase over the disbursements on the same account for the preceding year of $1,548,480.18.

In addition to this, there was allowed during the year, the certificates being issued before, but held back until after the 1st of July, $2,191,694.63, making the actual allowance of pensions for the year $141,990,936.75, being an increase over the preceding year of $3,776,174.81. Of those who now draw pensions 508,799 obtained them under what is known as the dependent-pension act—the act of June 27, 1890—and the sum paid in the last year on account of those pensioners was $55,586,290.75. The law of June 27, 1890, under which these pensions, amounting to $55,586,290.75, are drawn by the 508,799 pensioners, provides that—

> All persons who served ninety days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now or who may hereafter be suffering from a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact, according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month and not less than $6 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support.

It is further provided in the same act that the widow of any such soldier "without other means of support than her daily labor" may be pensioned during her widowhood at $8 per month.

It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that the pensions given to soldiers under this act are predicated, not upon injuries received in battle, but upon disability appearing after the close of the war. And in defining the degree of disability it is declared that the soldiers pensioned must be "suffering from a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support;" and it is provided also that the amount of pension shall be "proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support."

If the proposition were an original one—if, now, we were construing that language to determine who would be entitled to pensions, it would be fair, I think, to conclude that what I have quoted is not descriptive merely of persons with the sole object of identifying them. I submit that we might reasonably find that those only should receive pensions who are both unable to support themselves and without other reasonable means of support. This, I think, would be a reasonable construction; but a very different construction having been adopted and adhered to, an amendment, just to soldier and civilian, to pensioner and taxpayer, should go into the law to correct a serious wrong and restore lost rights.

Why should it be that the person who served but three months in the Army or the Navy of the United States and was honorably discharged should have a pension for physical disability, however great his capacity for earning a support or accumulating a fortune by other means, or however vast the fortune which he may have already? How can it be contended justly that such a person should be entitled to a pension by showing that he is unable to do what perhaps he never tried to do, never intended to do, never needed to do; that is, to earn a support for himself by manual labor?

Why should the man who is a trained lawyer, enjoying a large practice, with a correspondingly large income, having accumulated, perhaps, a large fortune—why should he be pensioned if unable to do that which he never made it his business to do and never expected to do—to earn his living by manual labor? Yet he is pensioned at the expense of the taxpayers of the country and to the endangering of the interests of the worthy and needy soldiers of the Republic.

Under this law of June 27, 1890, as construed, a man may be worth $100,000,000; he may be engaged in active business; he may have the largest money-producing establishments in the land; he may be at the top of his profession; he may be in all the vigor and prime of intellectual manhood, able to carry on the business to which he has been trained and of which he is master, and yet for ninety days' service in the Army or Navy of the United States, if his physical condition is such that he can not go on a farm or into the workshops, and there make his living by manual labor, to which he was never turned or had to turn, he is given a pension.

How many of this class are upon the pension rolls I do not know, and do not pretend to say. Who does know? Who shall say? But I do know, Mr. Chairman, that many men draw pensions under this law who are among the wealthy, substantial, and active business men of their several communities; and I think I may venture to assert that there is not a member upon the floor of this House who does not know of many such cases in his own neighborhood.

Now, where would the injustice be to the deserving pensioner, where the harm to the system itself, where the wrong, if those not entitled to pensions—who do not need them—were denied them?

With the increasing pension rolls and pension charges swelling beyond all predictions, expectations, and calculations, both in the number of pensioners and in the sums of money to be paid to them, there is a constant and ever-growing danger to the most worthy and deserving pensioner himself. Who is he?

Why, the true soldier, the man who bravely bore the brunt of the battle, following his country's flag through the storms of war, and who now is unable to earn his own living by the pursuit of such business as he has been accustomed to follow, and who can not, therefore, support himself and family decently either by his own exertions or out of his own accumulations, that is the man, and after him, when he is gone, his widow and his children—they are the ones who should be the beneficiaries, who should be cared for generously by proper legislation upon this important subject.

Of this class, liberal as these laws are, loose as they are, wrong as they are in some particulars, not a few find it exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to get upon the pension rolls at all. And yet the man who is in active business, who is enjoying a large income, and with the accumulations of wealth about him, may have a pension by showing that he was ninety days in the military service of the country, and was honorably discharged, and has not the physical ability to earn his living by manual labor—a labor to which he was never accustomed and to which he never had occasion to resort. And while that is true in his case, by little informalities, by useless obstructions, by trivial constructions of the law, many a gallant veteran of a hundred battles, though broken, poor, indeed helpless, dependent, traveling down to the ready, waiting, almost open grave, with hopes deferred, and deferred, and deferred, until its light will never shine on him in this world again, is unable to obtain any pension.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not make these remarks in a spirit of hostility either to the pension system or to the pensioners themselves. I submit them with no other view than that of calling the attention of the House, if I can, and the country, if I may, to some of the abuses in and under the law, to the end that fuller justice may be done to the deserving, and that the undeserving may be deprived of what they have no just title to.

How easy it would be by an amendment—and you gentlemen over there can make it—how easy it would be to correct the abuse pointed out by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN], on the authority, as I understand it, of the Commissioner of Pensions himself. How easy it would be, by a few lines of amendment to the law, to regulate things so that pensions will go where they should go and will be withheld from the undeserving. So I think it worth while to dwell upon what I believe to be the feature of greatest objection in the whole matter—the one responsible for the greatest abuses; the one which menaces, as I have already said, every worthy and honest pensioner throughout the length and breadth of the land—the granting of pensions to men in such financial condition that they do not need them, and therefore do not deserve them.

If pensions are to be given for services rendered in the Army merely, why raise the question about whether the applicant can earn a living by manual labor? If the pension should go simply for service and honorable discharge, then the law is wrong. If the pension should go, as it seems to me it ought, for honorable service and honorable discharge, coupled with that condition of affairs which makes it needful and useful, soberly and really, for the beneficiary, then the law ought to be changed so that no one but those who fall within such specifications can get pensions; and none but those should retain them.

How many thousands, how many hundreds of thousands, aye, how many millions, of dollars might be saved annually to the taxpayers of this country, or distributed among the needy pensioners, if you please, by such an amendment as I have indicated, neither I nor any other man can tell; but that the aggregate would be huge it seems to me no reasonable man can doubt.

Now, I shall not branch into the question whether expenditures are going to exceed revenues. I shall not go into a discussion of the question whether or not additional appropriations will have to be made on account of pensions if the law remains the same. I take it from the statement of the honorable chairman of the committee [Mr. CANNON], as well as the statement of the gentleman who has this bill in charge [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], and he statement of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN], and the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, all of whom are familiar with the details of the matter, that, as the law now stands and as the Pension Office is transacting business, the sum appropriated by this bill will be insufficient by eight million or ten million dollars to meet the demands for pensions for the coming year.

Now, expenditures always ought to be kept within income. Expenditures always ought to be adjusted to income; and when expenditures may be reduced without harm anywhere and in the way of promoting justice everywhere, what is the objection to the retrenchment?

For last year there was over $35,000,000 paid out under the dependent-pension act of 1890, and the demands are growing. If five million or ten million dollars could be saved by withdrawing pensions from those who do not need them, would not the saving be very considerable?

Would it not be an item in balancing the account between receipts and expenditures? Or, if the expenditure ought to be held up to one hundred and forty millions or one hundred and fifty millions anyhow, then, in the name of the soldiers who fought and suffered, in the name of the soldiers who are needy now, let this excess go to them, rather than to those who do not need it, and who, therefore, ought not to have it.

Is the rich merchant—the merchant prince whose wares go, with profit to him, to the remotest corners of the land, and whose clerks form an army of busy money makers for him—is he to be given a pension at the expense of the poor taxpayers or the poor soldiers, simply because in his money-making life he has not developed enough muscle, or somehow or another, through advancing years, has grown too weak to do that which he never tried to do and does not need to do—the earning of his living by manual labor?

Is the banker or the professional man whose returns are large, and whose business is entirely distinct and different from the earning of a livelihood by manual labor, is he in his affluence to be given a pension, at the expense of the poor taxpayer and the needy soldier, merely because he can make a showing that he could not support himself as a day laborer? That is the question to which I invite attention. Why ought it not to be discussed?

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that this is regarded as a tender subject. I am aware that gentlemen in the cloakroom and on the street will express sentiments and opinions about this matter which do not find voice and utterance upon the floor of this Chamber. If this be wrong, where is the wrong? If this be hostility to the pensioners, who shall point it out? If this be unjust to any interest in the country, I pray you show to me wherein lies the injustice or the wrong.

I commend to you gentlemen who have the power the importance of amending the law so that worthy applicants can get pensions irrespective of trifling technicalities; so that poor men with honorable records for service and honorable discharges may get pensions adequate to their wants. I commend to you such amendment of these laws as will bring about necessary reforms, just alike to the toiling people and to the suffering soldiery. I commend to your consideration, as one of the means of accomplishing true reform, the greatest means of accomplishing it, perhaps, such a change of the law and such a change of the administration of the law as that rich men can not, merely upon the ground of inability to earn a living by manual labor, to which they are strangers, draw from the Treasury money which ought to remain there for other purposes or ought to go to their needy brethren of the wars; money which now goes to swell accumulated wealth and to increase large incomes.

When the soldier is dead, his widow, a sorrow-burdened woman, must show that she is without means of support other than her daily labor. Where, then, would be the degradation of learning from the living soldier whether he needs a pension? What true man would shrink from the test applied to his poor wife after he is gone?

There is not a particle of reason why there may not be a more liberal policy pursued toward pensioners, needy and deserving, with a lessening of the amount expended for pensions. It rests with you, gentlemen, who have the power to manifest the will, and to so amend the law as that ample justice may be done to those who contribute the money which you appropriate and to those who need and deserve pensions. It can be done by simply withholding what there is neither charity nor justice in giving, and by bestowing more liberally to such as deserve and need more.

There is an impression prevailing that the man who suggests the slightest change in the pension laws or in their administration is hostile to pension legislation and to the soldiers, and that there may be bad effects somewhere, politically, upon him or upon those associated with him. I represent a constituency of brave and honest men, who desire to do what is right and who have an admiration for courage and honesty in others. I will not doubt, gentlemen, that honest, brave men lent you the aid of their votes. Then let me say to you that you misjudge the American nation if you believe the people are not in favor of such changes as will confine pensions to those who really need them, and preserve for the public and the pensioners broken in health and fortune the sums wasted—worse than wasted—upon those who need no help from the Government, and, needing none, ought to have none. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take any part in this debate, but I can not sit in silence and listen to the criticisms which have come from the other side of this Chamber as against the pension appropriation bill without at least making a brief statement in behalf of the old soldiers of this country, not in behalf of the "battle-scarred sutlers" that were referred to by my genial friend from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN]. My friend from Mississippi always clothes with humor any subject, however grave it may be, and we listen to him with pleasure and delight. He ought to remember, as no doubt he does, that the reason why this is the greatest pension roll that the world has ever seen is because it follows in the wake of the greatest war that the world has ever seen. The size of the roll is an evidence of his prowess and of the bravery of the men who fought with him upon the Southern side of the question.

This country at the very beginning of its existence started out with the idea of having practically no standing army; having in lieu of a great standing army a nucleus, a germ around which volunteers might rally, and upon which might be organized in times of our necessity an army great enough to meet any emergency that might arise. That policy necessitated the adoption of a plan of pensions in time of peace for the volunteers in time of war. It was commenced with the very beginning of our Government. The Revolutionary soldiers were put upon the pension rolls, first through lists revised by the Supreme Court, later on by acts of Congress—usually by special acts—until substantially all of them were put upon the rolls.

The war of 1812, the Indian wars that followed, and the Mexican war have also resulted in the same system; and instead of keeping a great standing army ready for any war that might arise, we have relied upon the people—the great mass of the people—to come forward; and in order to do that we have adopted the pension system which is now so severely criticised. Instead of keeping an army always ready, we have found the volunteer system has worked well. The South sent her volunteers to the Mexican war. They are upon the pension roll. The South will send her volunteers to the next war, whenever that may be, and everyone fighting under the Stars and Stripes in any war, if they become disabled, ought to have pensions. That has been the policy of this Government. It is true that the roll is a large one, but you must not lose sight of the fact that the war was also a great war.

Criticism has been indulged in as to one feature of the law—that a rich man may draw a pension. Very well; he can not draw a pension unless he is disabled. The old soldiers of this country, when the question came up as to whether a discrimination should be made against those who had means and that pensions should be allowed only to the poor, came forward almost as a man and said they did not want any "pauper legislation." They did not want legislation requiring them to go before the Commissioner of Pensions and ask for a pension on the ground that they were paupers; so that a certificate of pension would be simply an equivalent to an admission to the poorhouse. They resented anything of that kind, and it was in deference to that honorable, upright, and noble sentiment that no discrimination was made in favor of the poor and against the rich. [Applause.] The poor soldier was the most earnest in his opposition to such discrimination. And yet, Mr. Chairman, we have heard here to-day repeated criticisms of the law because it does not make such a distinction.

Mr. GAINES. Let me ask the gentleman this question: If Jay Gould were living to-day, would the gentleman be willing to pension him?

Mr. LACEY. If Jay Gould were living to-day and had fought in the war, say had lost his arm in the war, I would not care if he owned the whole Southern Confederacy, I would still pension him. [Applause.] I would not draw any such distinction as is suggested here. I would not require the old soldier to go down upon his knees at the Pension Office and say, "I am a pauper and I ask the grace of the Government." I would have him, rather, go and demand his pension as a right from the Government, which adopted that policy in years gone by. Mr. Chairman, this pension roll will decrease fast enough. A good deal of sport has been made in this debate about its not having reached the maximum. It has been said that it was to have reached the maximum in 1894; well, it would have done so in 1894 if the law had been fairly administered under the last Administration.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman let me interrupt him to say that it did reach the maximum in 1894? The amount then appropriated was $165,000,000, and the appropriation has been gradually growing less.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then the last Administration did do its duty?

Mr. ALLEN. The amount appropriated was $165,000,000, but a good deal of it was covered back into the Treasury.

Mr. LACEY. Yes, I was just about to explain to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] why the roll did not reach the full limit at that time. The Secretary of the Interior in that Democratic Administration was Mr. Hoke Smith, of Georgia. He had control of the Pension Bureau and he prevented the roll from then reaching the full limit. He was determined that it should not, and he applied all the power of the National Government to keeping it down, and the $8,000,000 that has been referred to as having been covered back into the Treasury was simply arrears from that Administration—money that ought to have been paid in 1894—so that we are paying now for the past as well as for the present.

Mr. MCRAE. Then, if this Administration intends to pay that amount, why not appropriate for it? If you say that that deficiency exists, why not appropriate for it?

Mr. LACEY. We will appropriate for it. An estimate is made by the Secretary of the Interior for $140,000,000——

Mr. MCRAE. You say Hoke Smith did not spend as much for pensions as he ought to have spent. Now, if he did not, and if you are going to spend it, why do you not appropriate for it?

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman from Arkansas either does not see the point or does not desire to see it. The present Commissioner of Pensions has pursued a liberal policy and yet has kept within the letter and spirit of the law, and yet an increase in the roll has come now from the fault of the previous Administration; it has come from the setting aside of orders made in the past cutting down pensions improperly. Pensions in many cases were cut down to $6 a month under the new law, which have been restored by the present Administration to the limit of the act of 1890—$12 a month. This Administration is doing that which the former one should have done.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I am sure my friend does not wish to misrepresent the administration of the Pension Office. Now, does he not know that when the act of 1890 was passed it became the policy of the Administration at that time, which was a Republican Administration, to allow pensions exclusively under the act of 1890, and to pretermit for the time being the applications which had been made under previous pension laws and which involved the payment of large arrearages? Does he not know that to be the fact, and does he not also know that in order to execute the act of 1890 the force in the Pension Office was increased by over 700 clerks? It was distinctly stated before the Committee on Appropriations as a reason why this increase of clerks should be allowed that it was the intention of the Administration to execute the act of 1890 as rapidly as possible.

Mr. LACEY. I do not concur in all of the gentleman's statement.

That the act of 1890 was given precedence in the Pension Office over the old law, "on account of the large arrearages" I do not concede; but I do concede that preference was given to claims under the act of 1890 for this simple reason: Under that act all the claimant had to do to get upon the roll was to prove that he was disabled, that he had an honorable discharge, that he had served ninety days or more in the Union Army, and that his disability was not caused by vicious habits of his own. When this state of facts was established by the proofs, he was put on the roll for the disabilities existing, not exceeding $12 a month. This made a simple and easy settlement of many cases, and as every man who applied under the old law would be entitled to apply under the new law in lieu of the old, cases under the new law that did not require any very technical examination were given precedence, and, following that, claims of the same soldiers were adjusted under the old law. The man was taken out of the poorhouse, or at least given relief, under the act of 1890, and, following that, he was granted his rating under the old law, if it exceeded $12 a month.

That method of settling claims was adopted, and I think it was wisely adopted. And there was no concealment about it. Openly and fairly the Administration adopted this course; openly and fairly the Commissioner of Pensions appeared before the committees of Congress and asked additional allowance for clerk hire so that this class of claims might be taken up and adjusted, and that men who were not upon the pension roll at all, who had applied under the act of June, 1890, should speedily have their claims adjusted. And new claims were given preference over claims for increase.

Mr. Chairman, there is another feature of the act of 1890 which has not been alluded to, and which ought to be fairly understood by this House. The great mass of cases allowed under the act of 1890 for disability were really allowed for disability contracted in the service; but owing to the lapse of time, owing to the uncertainty and frailty of the human memory, owing to the death of witnesses, it has been impossible in many cases to prove up those claims. Consequently a man who had had a claim filed under the old law would change his application and accept a pension under the new law, such pension being limited to $12 per month. This has been done in many cases where the disability was actually contracted in the service and in the line of duty. It was the purpose of the act of 1890 to enable claimants to do this.

To illustrate: Only a short time ago a man came to see me in regard to his pension application. He had lost one of his eyes in the service; yet he could not prove that fact. The injury was received from the explosion of a shell at Cold Harbor; but the exact circumstances of the occurrence could not be proved, so far as his case was concerned, because by that same shot fourteen or fifteen men were killed or injured. The difficulty was to prove which persons were injured by the explosion, and the injury to his eye was slight in the beginning. This man had endeavored to prove up his case under the old law; but some of the witnesses were dead and others scattered in various parts of the country, and he had not seen them for thirty years. I said to him, "Simply put in your application under the new law, and the Pension Office will give you a rating for the loss of your eye without proof that the injury originated in the service." Yet that man undoubtedly lost the sight of that eye by the explosion of a shell, although it was impossible for him to prove it after so great a lapse of time.

It was to cover cases of that kind that this law was adopted; yet the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] insists that we should first inquire in those cases whether the individual who has suffered an injury is able to support himself out of means which he may have accumulated, whether he is capable of earning a living in some other way than by manual labor. If, for instance, he is a lawyer or a doctor or a preacher, receiving income from his profession, the gentleman would exclude him. We had one case where the question came up as to whether a judge of the supreme court of one of the States could draw pension. He had been injured in such a way that his wound still required to be dressed every day. Twenty-five or thirty years after the war, and under the late Administration, it was then held that inasmuch as he was drawing salary as judge of the supreme court and able to live without the aid of the Federal Government, he should not receive a pension. But such is not the policy on which our pension laws have ever been framed. The pauper idea has never gone into our pension legislation; and it never ought to go there.

Mr. SAYERS. Does the gentleman mean to state that what he terms the "pauper idea" has never been embodied in the legislation of this country?

Mr. LACEY. Not as to disabilities contracted in the service.

Mr. SAYERS. Does the gentleman mean to make that statement?

Mr. LACEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is more familiar with the pension laws than I; but if I am not very much mistaken he will find by reference to the pension laws enacted in the earlier history of the Government that in some instances applicants were required to show the amount of property they possessed before they could receive pensions. I do not speak with absolute certainty; but such is my impression.

Mr. LACEY. The pensions granted in the earlier history of the Government were usually granted by direct act of Congress. If you will turn to the statute books of that period you will find page after page reciting the names of soldiers of the war of the Revolution to whom pensions were granted by special acts. Congress at that time settled those questions directly, and the simple question was as to the character of service. As to the Mexican war, the length of service entitling a man to a pension was very short, much shorter than the act of 1890.

Mr. SAYERS. I am reminded by a gentleman sitting near me of the law allowing an increase of pension to survivors of the Mexican war; and he tells me that one of the provisions of that act is that the applicant must show that he does not possess more than a certain amount of property. In other words, what the gentleman terms the "pauper idea" has been applied to the survivors of the Mexican war.

Mr. LACEY. The case which the gentleman cites was no exception. Service pensions were allowed to soldiers of the Mexican war without reference to disability, the only limitation being one of age. The law he refers to did not require the Mexican soldier to show disability contracted in the service. But such pensions were found inadequate in many instances, and special pensions in particular cases were granted by Congress to increase the amount, the original amount being $8 a month. The original pension was not predicated upon the idea of poverty, but upon the idea of helplessness and poverty additional pensions were allowed in those cases. Then a general law was enacted increasing the Mexican service pensions to $12 where the soldier was dependent, but for disability contracted in that war it was not necessary to show dependence.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to detain the committee longer upon this question. I regret to see this old straw thrashed over again by gentlemen on the other side of the House as it has been session after session in the past. The pension roll will grow small soon enough. It must of necessity become smaller rapidly from this time on, for the hand of death took 31,960 pensioners from the roll last year. This rate of death ought to satisfy the greatest pension hater in the land. The total number of pensioners dropped last year from all causes was 41,122. Among the pensioners now on the rolls are 65,869 minors who will soon pass the pensionable age. The average age of the soldiers of the late war is now 56 years. In fourteen years their average age will be 70. It is true that as to widows the pension will continue for a long time. That involves another question, as to which a measure has been proposed in this House, and I believe also in the Senate, to limit the rights of widows to the law actually in existence at the time of their marriage. The passage of that law would of course cut out perhaps 90 per cent or more of all the widows of the soldiers of the late war, because the great bulk of those soldiers were too young during the time that the war was going on to be married. Whether that would be a wise measure or not there will be time enough to discuss when it is brought before this body. As to the present appropriation, if it is not ample, an increased appropriation can be allowed. The amount embraced in this bill is precisely what the Secretary of the Interior has asked for. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] is certainly mistaken when he says I criticised the old soldier. I criticised some defects in these laws which refer not so much to the old soldier as to the people who are getting the benefit of the old soldier's services.

The gentleman says that this is a great pension roll and that it illustrates the prowess of the gentlemen with whom I stood in the slight "difference of opinion" which occurred some thirty-odd years ago.

Mr. Chairman, I would be the last man to attempt to belittle the services or detract from the credit due the Federal soldiers who put down the Confederacy; for, as I said in a speech in Congress once before, involved in the task of suppressing the Confederacy was the task of suppressing me, and I never wanted anybody to think that that was a small job. [Laughter and applause.] And, Mr. Chairman, I will repeat in substance another thing I said here once before, and that is that when I look at the fact, as stated by the War Records Office, that there were in the Federal Army in that war about 2,213,365 original enlistments, and that this was about three and a half times as many men as we had, and when I remember the disadvantages under which we contended, cut off from the outside world, without munitions of war sufficient to arm and equip the men we did have except as we captured them; with no navy, no medicine, no factories, and no money except such as we could print, and not very good printing facilities, and when I look at this enormous pension roll and the vast sums of money it takes to make good the disabilities we caused, and when we hear you tell us of what a bad cause we had and what a good one you had, I say, Mr. Chairman, any man is bound to confess that if we had had an equal showing and a good cause we would have put up a wonderful fight and have been a mighty "onproper" crowd to "monkey" with. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, while I am on my feet there is one other feature of your pension laws that I will criticise. I have seen much of it since I have been here, and that is the great discrimination made between officers and privates in the amounts of pensions paid to them and their widows. I know of no greater outrage or injustice than occurs in this matter, and as a friend of the private soldier I protest against it. I know something about war, and I give all due credit to good officers, but their positions were not so hard as those of the privates, and oftentimes not so hazardous.

I say the Government owes no greater debt of gratitude to any of its defenders than it owes to the man who stood with his musket in his hand in all sorts of weather, or marched on foot on all kinds of roads and in every sort of weather, and stood guard and guarded his officers while they slept, and then with musket and bayonet charged the enemy's lines. I tell you when you come to putting that man, his widow, or his children, on a very small pension, and go on and put somebody else on the roll—the officer who happened to command him—at an amount that is five times as great as that which you allow to him, you are doing an act of injustice, and I criticise the law that does it. It is not right to the meritorious man, the honest, brave soldier, for whose benefit your pension laws should be enacted. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, my friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] says that in the next war the Confederate soldiers will be found fighting under the old flag side by side with the Federals. That is very true, Mr. Chairman, so far as the Confederates are concerned. But I do not know whether my friend ever heard a little story that was told to me by a very gallant Federal colonel, something that took place at one of the blue and gray reunions in the State of Missouri. The Confederate soldier and Federal soldier got to be very "chummy;" they were mighty good friends, talking the war times over and enjoying themselves as we frequently do with each other here.

On one occasion, however, the Federal thumped the Confederate on the back and said, "Well, Johnny, we fought on separate sides in the last war, but if another comes we will be found under the old flag, shoulder to shoulder, fighting together for our Government." The Confederate said, "Well, we will, but you-uns won't." [Laughter.] The Federal asked him, "Why do you say that we won't be found fighting under the old flag?" The Confederate said, "Why, you can't; the pension roll shows that you-uns was all disabled." [Great laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask to have read the provision which I send to the Clerk's desk. I am aware that it is subject to a point of order, but I am going to ask unanimous consent to have it incorporated in the bill. It covers some of these points.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

From and after the passage of this act no widow of a soldier or sailor shall be allowed a pension unless the application for the same has been filed or shall be filed in the Pension Bureau during her widowhood: Provided, That in granting pension to widows and minor children the date of commencement shall be in all cases the date of the filing of the application in the Pension Bureau, this proviso to apply to all claims now on file or that hereafter may be filed: And provided further, That no pension shall be granted to any minor child or children unless the application for same was filed or may hereafter be filed during the pensionable minority of said minor or children: And provided further, That no pension to a widow of a soldier or sailor shall be granted or paid to said widow unless it is shown that the marriage of said widow to the soldier or sailor occurred prior to the passage of this act: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to the claims of insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless children; and all acts, or parts of acts, inconsistent with these provisos are hereby repealed.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, of course we have not reached a stage yet when amendments can be offered, and I understand that the gentleman does not offer this now.

The CHAIRMAN. He merely has it read for information.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not offer it now. I have simply had it read for information. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eighteen minutes remaining.

Mr. ALLEN. I yield eighteen minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I would have the pension roll a roll of honor. If it is not, I would have it made one. To that end I would suggest another amendment to the pension law, providing that the class of rich men who have their lives insured as "sound" persons, but who are at the same time drawing a pension as an "unsound" person, be stricken from the pension roll.

I am informed that it is a fact that there are numberless men in this country who are drawing pensions from the Government as "disabled" persons, and therefore "unsound" persons, but who at the same time are carrying large life insurance as able and sound individuals. What does this mean? How can the two things, "sound" and "unsound" or "able" and "disabled," exist at the same time with the same person?

How can such things occur, unless it be that there is a falsehood out? A man in order to get insurance avers to the insurance company, if he does not swear, that he is "sound," and then he turns around and avers to the Government of the United States that he is "unsound" to get a pension. He takes the pension money then and pays his insurance charges.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

Mr. GAINES. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Do I understand you to say that you would disqualify any soldier who carries life insurance from drawing a pension?

Mr. GAINES. I do not mean that there may not be exceptions. But how can a man be "sound" and "unsound" at the same time?

Mr WM. ALDEN SMITH. I want to ask——

Mr. GAINES. But I do say, Mr. Chairman, that the pension law, if the spirit of it is properly carried out, should not allow the Jay Goulds of this country to receive pensions, even though "disabled." [Applause.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES. I decline to be further interrupted.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee declines to be further interrupted.

Mr. GAINES. I say, sir, that "disability" may constitute a prima facie case of inability to earn a livelihood. It should not be conclusive. But the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], for whom I have great respect, would have pensions go to the Jay Goulds of this country, who live on large incomes already earned, while he would let the paupers of the country, who are unable to employ pension attorneys or to make a living, and who have none, do without pensions, or be a long time in getting them, as improperly happens in some cases in my country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we, in the Southern country, pay large taxes to the Government. We are ready, willing, and glad to pay an honest pension to an honest pensioner. We do that without murmuring; but we do think, sir, that we have a right to object to paying the Jay Goulds of this country, who may be simply shot in the "substitute" in all possibility, when the records show that we have only one pension office in the South, at Knoxville, an office which, I believe, Mr. Cleveland recommended to be abolished, and the official figures show that out of the enormous pensions that are paid only 4 per cent of them come to the South. Hence it is, Mr. Chairman, that the South is drained of the money that she would otherwise have. We do not wish any pensions except those which are legitimately and properly given.

But this Congress will be called upon to protect the "Navy" of this country in another way before it is "disabled." We shall be called upon to extricate the Government of the United States from the clutches of your Carnegies, who would impose upon our brave Navy rotten armor plate. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the man who will place upon our ships of war defective armor plate, and then permit these men to go upon that vessel to battle for the Stars and Stripes, without telling them of the condition of the armor, is guilty of a species of treason that should be condemned by every member of this House.

But such has been the case, and that, too, when we were paying on an average $606 a ton for armor plate, when the raw material and labor only cost $167.30 per ton, while at the same time perfect armor plate was being sold by Carnegie to Russia at $247, made from, or in part from, Southern raw material. Now, as a partial recompense for the immense appropriations paid for pensions in the East and Northwest and in foreign countries, we shall ask you to deal fairly with the South and give us a chance to have established by Congress an armor-plate plant that will, at least to some extent, counterbalance these oppressive appropriations that by force of the law go to other places and in other directions.

I yield back the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman yields I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. GAINES. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman has referred frequently to the "Jay Goulds" that are being pensioned under this pension law, evidently endeavoring to create the impression that a large number of rich men are pensioned under the act of 1890. I would ask him if he knows of any instance of that kind, and if there are any such cases in fact?

Mr. GAINES. I hope there are not many such; but the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] said to-day that he would vote for a law to pension Jay Gould, or to make the granting of a pension depend upon "disability" pure and simple, even though the party disabled was rich and plenty able to live without work.

Mr. HEPBURN. But you have been talking about conditions that exist, or that might be brought about. Do you know of any such case as that about which you have inveighed?

Mr. GAINES. That is a condition that would arise under the pension law as it is administered, or would be if a case arose, and it is clearly your policy.

Mr. HEPBURN. You know that there are no such cases as those of which you speak, and you have been inveighing against an imaginary condition, for the purpose of bringing contempt upon the pension law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GAINES. The statement made by your colleague [Mr. LACEY] that he would pension Jay Gould if living, a Federal soldier, and "disabled," shows the underlying policy of the Republican party in pensions and calls forth my condemnation of such a policy.

I do not propose to bring contempt upon the pension law, but I am opposed to your bringing unnecessary expense upon the taxpayers of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLEN. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have an amendment read which I send to the Clerk's desk, and which I will offer at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read for the information of the committee.

Insert after the word "separately," line 7, page 2, the following:
"Provided further, That any soldier of the war of 1861 to 1865 now on the pension rolls, or who may hereafter be placed on the pension rolls, who did not engage in any battle nor incur any disability while in the service, and who served less than three years, shall receive not more than three-fourths the pension rate fixed by law for a soldier of like disability who fought in battles and served throughout the entire war; and any such soldier who served less than two years shall receive not more than two-thirds the pension rate fixed by law for a soldier of like disability who fought in battles and served throughout the entire war; and any such soldier who served less than one year shall receive not more than one-half the pension rate fixed by law for a soldier of like disability who fought in battles and served throughout the entire war."

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I was encouraged to offer the amendment by the cordial manner in which the chairman of the subcommittee on the pension bill assured my friend from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] that points of order would not be made on meritorious amendments. One of the purposes of the pension laws is to assure the people that men who go out and fight battles are entitled to the gratitude of the country, and that it is the determination of the Government that they shall be honored, and if disabled, shall be cared for. The pension roll should be made, as has been so well said by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], "a roll of honor." What we want to do is to impress upon the growing generation the fact that there is nothing to be more cherished and honored than the courage of the men who fight our battles.

This sentiment, fostered in the children of earlier days, it was that developed the bravery of the men whose record in the Mexican war threw a halo of glory over the name of American. The honors lavished upon the heroes of that war did much to cultivate in our people that which caused them to seize their arms and march forth to do battle in 1861.

Every sentence in our pension laws should bristle with evidence that it is soldierly courage we seek to honor and reward.

The amendment which I proposed makes a distinction in favor of a soldier who fought in battle and who stood by his colors during all the four years from 1861 to 1865. For us to fail to make this distinction would place such a soldier on an exact equality with one who engaged in no battle, and who was either dilatory in offering his services or else returned to his home leaving his comrades standing in line of battle—a gross and, I may say, a criminal injustice.

A country which does not cherish a chivalric spirit among its people will finally cease to be a country of chivalry. No country can continue to be respected and prosperous which is not a land of chivalry. The failure to honor and reward soldierly prowess has made the Chinese Empire, with its population of 400,000,000, inferior to Japan, with 35,000,000. It was to the infusing of this spirit in the French soldiery that was largely due the brilliant victories which they achieved early in the century.

Napoleon told his soldiers that when they returned to their homes crowds would greet each one of them with the words of praise, "He belonged to the army of Italy."

Let us give every soldier a parchment certifying to the battles in which he has taken part, and let him have evidence that will mark him as a soldier who fought in actual battle. This man fought with Grant in the great battles of the Wilderness and Spottsylvania; this man was under Buell at Perryville; this man charged with heroic courage under Burnside at Fredericksburg. Something that will say to the world: This man led the fight in the hornet's nest at Shiloh, where, I believe, my friend from Iowa, General HENDERSON, was so seriously wounded.

Let us, at this session, provide that such a certificate, signed by the President of the United States, be given to every soldier who fought in battle.

Let us, Mr. Chairman, do a duty of this kind to the soldiers who fought in battle. Let us also provide that every soldier who fought in battle shall have his name recorded and printed so as to remain a perpetual reminder that he engaged in battle for his country. It is that character of legislation which would cost but little, but would do ten times more for the honor and glory of our country than giving pensions to men who never heard a gun fire during their enlistment in the Army.

My attention was called a short time ago to the fact that a man who enlisted in the Federal Army in April, 1865, and was discharged in September, without ever leaving the State of Kentucky, and without being within a hundred miles of a battle, is to-day receiving a pension of $12 a month, while brave, chivalrous men who fought battle after battle—who fought at Perryville, in the Wilderness, at Spottsylvania, at Fredericksburg, and in the trenches of Petersburg, and other battles—are now without pensions because they are unwilling to come forward and swear that they are unable to do a full day's labor to support their families. Is that right or just? Is that the character of legislation which will build up the spirit which has been and always should be the pride and glory of American people?

The real soldiers know that they have no better friends on this floor than the Democratic members from the South. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] was right when he said that in another war that section of our land would be among the first to furnish soldiers to fight in defense of their country. The South has always been prompt in furnishing her quota of soldiers. The heroic army which fought under Taylor from Palo Alto to Buena Vista and under Scott from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico was composed largely of Southern soldiers.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I shall make no apology for saying a few words upon this bill. It seems to me that all of us, without regard to party affiliation, without regard to which side of the Mason and Dixon line we may live upon, have a right to fairly discuss all appropriations of the people's money. This is a large bill, and I can not hope to reduce it by anything I may say, but when the amount appropriated for pensions for the current fiscal year is equal to about half the entire income of the Government under the Dingley law, and when the amount proposed to be appropriated for the next fiscal year is as large as that for the current year and yet is confessedly eight millions short of what will be required under the liberal policy of the present Commissioner of Pensions, with a dwindling revenue and an increasing pension roll, it seems to me it is right and proper that any and all of us should seriously and honestly consider what can be done to retrench. The truth is, we must spend less money, increase taxes, or borrow.

Now, I shall not undertake to discuss the inequalities and the wrongs that have grown up, or that may grow up, in the Pension Office. The delays are annoying and exasperating to claimants who are worthy and needy, and I know, as every gentleman who has had anything to do with pensions knows, that some bad cases will be allowed, while many deserving cases are rejected. There are some errors made and many inequities as to the rating, but I assume that the cases are decided according to the testimony on file. It is boastfully stated on the other side by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] that this Administration is more liberal in administering the pension laws than the last, and he says that the maximum of the pension roll was not reached under the last Administration because of the unfriendly manner in which the law was then construed. This I deny. I ask the majority of this House and I ask the gentleman, Why do you not appropriate more money than was given to the last Administration, if it is expected that more ought to be and will be needed for pensions?

But, Mr. Chairman, my purpose in rising was to indorse in a general way what has been said by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] and by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] in favor of putting limitations upon certain parts of the laws, and I want to add another suggestion which I hope will be carried out in the near future, and that is, that the Pension Bureau be transferred from the Interior Department to the War Department and taken entirely out of politics. As far as I am concerned, I want every soldier, and every widow of a soldier, and every child of a soldier who is entitled to a pension under any just law to get it with as little delay and expense as possible. But we owe it to ourselves, we owe it to the soldiers, their widows and children, that the administration of whatever pension laws we may have shall be by a Department against which such charges as have been made by the gentleman from Iowa can not be made. Transfer it to the War Department of the Government and take it out of politics.

In further support of the proposition that politics does sometimes enter into the administration of that Bureau, I want to call attention to some statements the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] made in this Chamber in April, 1892; and I presume that the conditions therein set forth are relatively about the same now as they were then. I quote these remarks to show this House and the country that under all Administrations, whether Democratic or Republican, politics do creep into the administration of the Pension Bureau, a state of things which ought not to exist. I do not criticise one party more than another in this respect, and I make no specific charges against anyone, but only call attention to what I think remarkable and striking facts.

Why is it that Indiana should have a pension list so much larger than the State of Illinois in proportion to the soldiers furnished to the Army during the war? The difference is so great, Mr. Chairman, as to shock the sense of thinking men. Let me illustrate for a moment. The State of Indiana placed in the field during the late war 196,363 soldiers. Remember the number. She has on the pension list to-day 55,704 persons. Her sister State of Illinois, lying side by side, geographically speaking, placed in the field in the late war, and subject to the same conditions as those furnished by the State of Indiana, 259,097 soldiers, and yet the State of Illinois has on the pension rolls only 49,711 persons. Illinois, with 65,000 more soldiers in the war than Indiana, has 6,000 less pensioners on the rolls.

Take the population of the States and compare them in the same way as I have compared the soldiers contributed. Indiana has a population of 2,192,140 people, while Illinois has 3,826,351. Indiana has 1 in every 39 of her population on the pension roll, while Illinois has 1 in 76 of her people on the rolls. Of her enlisted men, Indiana has on the pension rolls 1 in every 3½ men enlisted, as nearly as I can estimate it, because the fraction does not run out exactly——

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Arkansas how he gets at the number of Indiana soldiers pensioned? Does not he ascertain it from the payments made at the Indiana agency?

Mr. McRAE. I quote from the gentleman from Tennessee, but I presume he got the facts as you suggest.

Mr. HEPBURN. And the number for Illinois is ascertained in the same way, from the payments made at the Chicago agency. Now, the soldiers who have gone from Illinois to Iowa and the Dakotas and Nebraska and Kansas would not be paid at the Illinois agency, and therefore the assumed information furnished by the statement which the gentleman is quoting is not very valuable.

Mr. McRAE. This information, I presume, was obtained from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, and the gentleman knows that the records show in each case the State and the regiment and the company to which the soldier belonged. But, whatever the gentleman's suggestion may be worth, these figures, if true, in connection with his explanation, certainly show that Indiana is a good State for a claim for a pension to come from. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Does it not show simply that a larger proportion of the people of Illinois have moved westward?

Mr. McRAE. I think it shows exactly the reverse, because no more people have migrated from Illinois than from Indiana. There is no reason in the world why more should move west from Illinois than from Indiana. The census returns show that Illinois has increased in population more than Indiana, and I believe that more people have gone to Illinois in proportion to its population than have to Indiana. But, Mr. Chairman, I have adverted to these figures in order to show that in Indiana, which, ever since I have been old enough to know anything about politics, has been a pivotal State, there has been a greater number of allowances of pension in proportion to population than in Illinois or in any other State in the Union. Perhaps they have received no more than justly due, but if so, the other States for some reason have been neglected.

Now, still quoting from the gentleman from Tennessee, let us follow this parallel a little further:

Ohio, though not so close, politically speaking, as Indiana, is always a close battle ground, sent 313,180 men to the war, and she has on her pension rolls 75,448 people; while the State of New Jersey, which has not been so doubtful politically, but has been steadily Democratic, sent 76,814 soldiers to the war, and she has a pension roll of only 13,375. Pennsylvania has of her enlisted men in the war about 1 in 5½ on the pension rolls, and of her population 1 in 82. Massachusetts has 1 in 6 of her enlisted men and 1 in 86 of her population on the rolls. Rhode Island has of her enlisted men about 1 in 9 on the rolls, and of her population 1 in 119. I will insert a table here showing, if the committee will consent, the figures of the different States as I have given them, and of some of the other States in detail.

Why is it that Indiana has on the pension rolls 100 persons for each 350 enlisted soldiers during the war, while Illinois has only 100 for each 550 soldiers enlisted during the war? Pennsylvania and Massachusetts show about the same ratio as Illinois, and New York shows 100 for each 700 so enlisted. I ask if this difference, which is so marked, is to be accounted for on the ground that the Indiana and Ohio soldiers fought more bravely in that war than did those from Illinois or Pennsylvania or from the Old Bay State?

Mr. Chairman, whether the reasons here assigned are the correct ones or not, I submit in all candor to the House and to the country that we ought to remove the administration of the pension laws and the disbursement of the enormous appropriation of pension money from even the possibility of such suspicion, and I trust that by some appropriate legislation this Congress will transfer the Pension Bureau to the War Department, make it a permanent bureau, and put it in charge of army officers who will administer it honestly and fairly to the people who pay the taxes and the pensioners who are the beneficiaries, uninfluenced and unmoved by political changes.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I interrupted the gentleman from Tennessee because I desired him to explain somewhat the remarkable statement he made to the House that he would debar all the soldiers from the pension roll who had their lives insured. The statement was so silly and absurd that the gentleman from Tennessee qualified it when he caught his breath and declined to be interrupted further upon that point. Is it any disgrace to a soldier to carry a little life insurance? If, by the accident of war, he has lost an arm or an eye, would the gentleman exclude him from taking the ordinary precautions of prudent men just because he was a soldier and helped to fight the battles of his country in its direst need?

Why, Mr. Chairman, I have listened in amazement to the propositions made upon the other side of this Chamber. They come to me almost new. The distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] made several charges before taking his seat. He found fault with and abused the widow of our veteran dead; he had no love or pity for the orphan, and he knit his brow and squeezed his heart to make some little show of love for the veteran to whom he was opposed for so many years in that terrible conflict. I was surprised to see that always generous man, the fighting representative and great cavalry leader of the Confederacy, Gen. JOE WHEELER, the gentleman from Alabama, oppose a proposition only intended to do justice to those who fought and won in opposition to him.

But the most pitiful and humiliating spectacle was when the distinguished wit and ex-Confederate from Mississippi was about to take his seat, after having turned and twisted his scorn and ridicule into so many fruitful places, as he believed, having insulted the widow and the veteran, having made a charge that he can not sustain, he then turned to the old heroes of the war seated upon this side of the Chamber, to whom he was opposed as a Confederate soldier, and begged of them that they would not give him the sound trouncing that he richly deserved.

Mr. Chairman, I was not a soldier of the war. But, thank God, I am able to resent the attack upon the veteran soldiers in this high place by ex-Confederates to-day.

In answer to the charge made by the gentleman from Mississippi, that the soldiers' homes of the country are being used by designing young women for the purpose of trapping old soldiers into matrimony and getting some relief, forsooth, by way of the pension roll, I will say this: Mr. Chairman, I represent a district in which the Soldiers' Home of the State of Michigan is located.

Mr. ALLEN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state to him that I obtained my information on that subject from the present Commissioner of Pensions. That is not Confederate authority.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I take the responsibility of denying, on behalf of the present Commissioner of Pensions, that he ever made any such statement to the gentleman from Mississippi, for it is as false as it can be. Whatever may have been said by the Commissioner, it will not bear the construction put upon it by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. ALLEN. The verbal soldier takes the responsibility of denying what is a fact.

Mr. GAINES. The Commissioner of Pensions made the same statement to me.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The Michigan Soldiers' Home, Mr. Chairman, has among its various departments a place where the widow of the soldier may live in peace and comfort. The State of Michigan pays all the expenses of making this provision for the widows of soldiers, and the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi will not be called upon to vote a dollar to sustain any Michigan soldier's widow in the Soldiers' Home of our State. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of liberal pensions to the soldier and to the widow who guarded his home during his absence in the field. You have not touched the maximum, and I do not care when the maximum is reached, so long as the soldiers' roll does absolute justice to the men who contended on the field of battle with some of the gentlemen on the other side for the supremacy of the Union.

I do not believe that designing widows exist in any such large numbers as the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi imagines; but I am not so conversant with that branch of the subject as the gentleman might be.

But, Mr. Chairman, we have in the Soldiers' Home of Michigan many deserving widows. We have many asking us for pensions that ought to be granted. Many a widow now fails to get a pension because her husband happened to be so situated during his lifetime that he did not need it, but upon his death the pension became necessary to sustain the widow, and my vote, while I am a member of this House, shall always be cast to give any deserving widow a pension for the services of her soldier husband upon any field of conflict in the late war.

Mr. Chairman, my voice and my vote shall be given to the soldier who needs a pension. My voice and my vote shall be at the service of the soldier whether he needs a pension or not; for many a man going through life feels himself independent to-day, but to-morrow he may need a pension badly. To-day the evidence is at hand; to-morrow it may be scattered and gone. The soldier is justified in making his application for pension while the proof is within his reach, while he can obtain the necessary evidence; and I would not limit him in that right if he rendered any honorable service to his country, if he helped to carry his flag through danger and peril to triumphant and brilliant victory.

Mr. Chairman, our soldiers have a roll of honor. Thank God, it is not such a roll of honor as the hand of a Confederate Democrat may soil or sully. We have heard much of a roll of honor upon the other side. Thank God, the roll of honor of the American soldier hangs out in the blue canopy of heaven with God's hand upon it. The names upon it are indelibly written so high that you can never wipe out the record of the brilliant services of the men who faced the storm of bullets fired by you in battle and finally gave their lives in devotion to the cause of the Union which you tried to destroy. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the assaults which are made upon this appropriation are not made in good faith. Such assaults indicate your natural unfriendliness to the soldier. Your management of the Pension Office under Hoke Smith drove many a worthy pensioner from the roll during the Democratic administration, and I hope you are comfortable in your great achievement. Mr. Chairman, I would make the pension granted a vested right that no Secretary of the Interior, that no Commissioner of Pensions, could ever strike down. I would throw around it all the safeguards necessary to protect the country against imposition; but the pension having been granted for a worthy cause, I would, if I were in the place of some gentlemen on the other side, call off my spies and cease to further pursue the veteran pensioner during the remaining years of his life. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, in listening to the debate this afternoon I have frequently thought of my old comrade in the field; and listening to the last remarks by the gentleman from Michigan, I thought of him again and especially of the expression I have often heard coming from his lips: "God save us from our friends." [Laughter.]

I believe, sir, that the intentions of most men are good, and I believe that all men upon this floor desire to do the right thing. But it seems strange, indeed, that after thirty years or more of effort on the part of the people of this country to do the right thing for the men who fought under the Union flag in the rebellion, you find that constantly the wrong thing is being done. Time is being wasted in fruitless debate here and in making propositions before this body that are futile and will never be carried out and that every soldier who maintains his reason and common sense knows never will be and never can be done for him.

I look upon the other side of the House and see there some of my old comrades in arms, men I know who were on the field of battle, and I have found every one of them sitting silent in his seat listening with wonder and amazement to the expressions that have fallen from the lips of some of the men so wonderfully patriotic now thirty years after the war has closed. [Applause and laughter.] I have no charge to make against you men who fought in the Southern Confederacy. We settled that question on the field of battle. But when a man fights thirty years after the war is over, it is the very best evidence on God's earth to my mind that he did not do very much fighting thirty years before. [Applause and laughter.]

I stand for an honest pension roll; and I say to you that men who are the most glib in speaking of and for the old flag, and of "America for Americans," and the "glory and the honor of the Federal soldiery," and the "faith of the nation"—I say that they have done less for the Federal soldier, although having it within their power, than any other set of men could possibly have done. On the other hand, you have done very much against them for which you should beg their pardon indeed.

I would like to see that pension roll a roll of honor, too, Mr. Chairman, but to-day it is a roll that before a man can inscribe his name upon it he must follow a tortuous and winding road, filled with numerous quagmires, in which he is very much more likely to be lost or drowned than to succeed in passing to secure the inscription of his name upon the roll.

You charge upon men who make assertions upon the floor of the House with reference to the subject that it is an untruth, and it goes out to the country that you are defending the soldier and defending his widow. Is that true? Come out in the open light, men, and let yourselves be seen and known as you are. If you desire to assault the pension roll, if you desire to build up the failing and still further rapidly failing features of the Dingley law, come out and do it like men, and say what you want to do and what you want to accomplish; and the applicants for pensions, and the friends of those who are applicants for pensions, even the men who deserve pensions, if necessary to maintain the honor and the dignity of the Government, would be ready to give up their claims and go off the roll. But do not undertake to charge on this side the crime of assaulting the soldier's widow and the old soldiers themselves in order to hide your own delinquencies, for I repeat, and I stand here ready to defend the assertion that the Commissioner of Pensions not only said this upon the street, but besought the Committee on Pensions to assault the pension roll and to prohibit the widow of the soldier from ever receiving a pension and the child of a soldier from receiving it from and after the passage of the law, and he desired to place upon the statute books beyond that that the widow and the child of the soldier were no longer the wards of the nation.

It is not an assault by the Confederacy. We licked you in every assault you ever made. We could do it again if you wanted to do it here, but we can not whip the assaults coming from our pretended friends upon the other side of the House. You are too well armed; and I do ask you in the name of honor and of decency to be fair to the soldiers of this country. You demand of a soldier now more than you demand of anyone on God's earth, before any court in the land, or before any committee. By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made most soldiers either stand upon the rejected roll or commit moral and legal perjury to reach the roll. These are the plain truths that some soldier ought to have said on this floor years ago.

Look at the requirements which have been added year by year, until men old and bent and infirm with age and the wounds received in the early sixties are rapidly going to the grave, asking them to remain off the roll because they can not prove that they were sound men before they went into the Army, can not prove that which the Government established for them; because a man can not prove by two comrades who served with him the particular occasion when and where he contracted hemorrhoids or how he got heart disease. Indeed, it is strange to me that we quibble over this law. I will vote for that pension roll if you make it $175,000,000, without quibbling, without fault.

I desire to come to the defense of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN], whom I believe has been misled, and say that I do not believe the charge he has made. I have a soldiers' home within my own district, a district in which were raised parts of thirteen as brave regiments as ever went upon the field. I live in a State where a soldiers' home of the Union is established also; and I say it is an aspersion upon the fair name of American women to charge that they will go into conspiracies to marry the aged and decrepit soldier, in order that they may get the meager pension that is handed out to him, a pension which, when granted to her, would scarcely feed the flock of sparrows that come to her humble door. American women do not need to go into such conspiracies. If you want to find conspiracies against the Government, hunt for them somewhere else. Conspiracies exist here. You had it all during the last session, when you robbed the American people and made indigent the soldiers who fought in the war by as unholy a measure of taxation as ever was placed upon any statute book upon God's earth.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not yield the palm to any man who carried a sword or to any man who carried a musket. I want to do for him all that is in reason, but when you make the pretense, then I want you to carry out the pretense in fact. Do as you upon that side of the House can do for the soldier, and do not attack him. You will attack him. You have already done it. I am sorry for this side of the House that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] and the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] were presented, because if they had not come from this side of the House they would have come from the other side.

When you attack this roll to prevent the giving of pensions to the soldier's child and to the soldier's widow there is a purpose behind it. The only purpose is to cut off a needed expenditure—a much needed one, perhaps—to the woman who marries the old man and to the children that may follow him. But the purpose of it is to bolster the falling and failing revenues of the country under the new tariff system. Why do you do it? It is a fine policy, indeed, to commence retrenchment at the nursing bottle of the soldier's babe or at the door of his widow who sits by his grave, waiting for him who will never return.

I know that the pension roll grows apace. Why should it not? You men who stop to reason ought to have known that it would. Here and there a soldier dies, it is true, but the man pensioned in the early days after the war is growing older now. The wound which then did not trouble him has now become troublesome, and diseases then implanted in his system are racking him at this hour, and it is no more than just and fair and honorable and decent that his pension should increase with the increasing infirmities of his life. I care not where it goes, if you will give honest taxation, if you will tax the money of this land, if you will tax the property of America in fairness and justice, if you will make the wealth and the corporations of the land pay their honest dues to an honest government, you will never have need of the complaint of the magnitude of the pension roll.

My friends upon the other side of the House, you have got a great deal of glory out of this pension business. You have got a great deal of credit out of it, and I do not desire to take one laurel from your brow; but I ask you, will you go with me to do simple and honest justice? If you want to do honest justice, in fairness and equity, then I plead with you to revise your pension laws so as to make it possible for a man to get a pension who is entitled to it in honesty and fairness, but who can not prove it, as the man can who spent most of the time in the hospital or who lived along the lines, but never crossed them in his life.

Upon the pension rolls to-day are men who receive the highest pensions who never went beyond the city of Washington, or farther south than the city of Louisville, while men who in the early fight crossed steel with you in the South, men who marched through your marshes, by your creeks, and climbed your mountains, are debarred from pensions solely because of proof which they can not get short of the domain of heaven or of hell, to whichever place they went, and never can be reached otherwise. And you allow that iniquity to continue year after year without remedy. Yes, it is true, as was said by the gentleman from Mississippi. Quit making your distinctions. They are invidious. They are wrong. Where would your war and where would your glory to the Federal Army have been except for the private in the ranks? There is no trouble about reaching it here. Let an officer's widow call for a pension in this House, and it passes at once.

I promise you that I will give the gentleman from Michigan an opportunity. In the near future he shall have an opportunity to show his loyalty, patriotism, and love of the soldier. I will present some bills upon this floor where you shall have the opportunity to do justice to the widow of the private as well as to the man who led him in the field. I will give you that opportunity; and I pledge you my word of honor here and now, I do not expect that justice will be done. Pretenses and proclamations after proclamations have been made. You say we are a great and generous Government to the soldier. You show the mighty expense of the pension roll. The expense is not in the pension roll, but largely in the administration of the pension laws. You are having hundreds of men going all through the United States, in every State of the Union, into the Rocky Mountains, into the fastnesses of the Western wilds, hunting down men under a system of espionage, trying to prevent them from going on the pension roll, and thereby costing the Government thousands of dollars a day.

Why do you not correct such evils as that? Stop prating about the grandeur of the war or the results of the war, but do your duty in honest, plain fairness. Do not hide your heads, and do not reduce the pension roll for the purpose of bolstering up something, but stand flat-footed upon it as men, and then the soldiers of the North will believe you are the soldiers' friends, and not until justice is done will they believe in the lot of pretenses that you utter upon this floor. Mr. Chairman, I have sat in my seat with amazement in days gone by when I heard of an unsullied flag and unsullied currency and sound money; when I heard of revenues to support the Government, and of the patriotism and loyalty of this land, of America for Americans; and yet we have seen, as you have within the last two years, Americans insulted, her soldiery despised, her flag even disgraced, amidst all this talk of loyalty, patriotism, and grandeur, by reason of the insults of Spain.

When a word is spoken here in behalf of the struggling Cubans, action is prevented in behalf of those holding the securities of Spain. I am tired of this protestation, this talk of the glory and the patriotism and loyalty of it. I want you to bring on that pension bill, and raise it as high as you dare, and every Federal soldier on this side of the House will vote with you. But I want you to do the thing honestly and straightforwardly, and not cover it up with talk of loyalty and lower revenues; that is nothing but promises, and promises that turn to ashes and rust and mold with age. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, if I can be recognized, I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MIERS] such time as he might want.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this nation owes a debt of gratitude to the Union soldier that can never be paid in money nor in laudatory words spoken upon the floor of this Hall. In 1861, when the right of secession was declared, when the flag of the Union was fired on, when one portion of this country was willing to rend the country in twain, when we had no standing army and but a small navy, the President of the United States called on the people for a voluntary army. In a few days the quota was full—a surplus and men to spare. After a few months more this country boasted of the proud spectacle of the most patriotic, the most efficient and most self-sacrificing army that ever went forth to do battle for any country, thereby demonstrating the fact that the strength of this Government lies in the common people. It is not in concentrated wealth; it is not in corporate power; it is not with a gold standard; it is not with bimetallism, nor all of these combined. It is with the patriotic masses. It is the common people who fight the battles of the country, who clear the forests, who yield all the wealth there is in this country.

Mr. Chairman, to this country I give one note of warning. If this beloved Republic of ours, "the home of the free, the land of the brave," "the government for the people," is to abide, there must be less attention by the legislation of this country to the corporations, less to the strong, less to the favored few, and more attention to the masses. When by class legislation, Mr. Chairman, you cool the patriotic ardor of the people, such as composed the late Union Army, it will be a sorry day. They are entitled to fair treatment, exact justice, and may rise in their dignity and demand it.

Mr. Chairman, this country is always secure without a standing army, without a considerable navy, for its strength lies in the patriotic hearts of the great toiling millions of the people. A third of a century has passed since the close of the war, and we have a great pension roll; and to-day the House of Representatives, through one of its committees, has before it an appropriation bill to meet the cost of that pension roll. Some gentlemen say they would make that roll a roll of honor. I say yes, make it a roll of honor, but I would have gentlemen halt there a moment while I say to them that it is now a roll of honor. True, like every other human institution, it is subject to error. It may have been imposed upon.

I do not question that there are some names upon the roll that should not be there. I do not doubt that there are many other names which should be upon the pension roll that are not there. I do not question that many a deserving soldier has had to run the gantlet too long before his name has appeared upon that roll, but in the main, Mr. Chairman, the pension roll is not only a roll of honor, but it is the greatest, the proudest roll of honor ever made by any people or by any government; and, Mr. Chairman, while I believe there is a demand upon this body for retrenchment, for reform, for the cutting down of public expenditures, and while I am prepared to join hands with gentlemen upon either side of the Chamber for the reduction of public expenditures wherever it may be done, yet I do not believe there is any demand from any source, or from any part or section of this country, that the business of retrenchment shall be begun on the pension roll.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that there is any considerable number of men, regardless of section, regardless of politics, who would begin a system of parsimonious legislation for the men who endured so much, the men who sacrificed so much and so long in order that we might have not only a united but a prosperous country, with one Constitution and one flag and one common interest.

I do not believe there is anyone who would for a moment desire that the men who fought to bring about that glorious result should be made the first objects of retrenchment. No, gentlemen, you not only stand by the patriotic hearts that fought the battles of the past, but you stand by the men on whom you must rely to fight the battles of your country in the future. It is their just desert; besides, it is economy to the Government. Their stout, patriotic hearts relieve this country of the necessity of a standing army. If I were to criticise the chairman of the committee presenting this bill it would be for presenting a bill which appropriates only $141,000,000 when the amount ought to be $151,000,000. Why? Because all the reports from the Secretary and from the pension agencies show that there is need for $150,000,000 to pay the pensioners borne on the rolls.

Gentlemen, if you are going to be fair with the old soldier, if you are going to stand fairly before the country, and if $151,000,000 is needed, then say $151,000,000, even though, perchance, it may illustrate the fact that the tariff bill passed at the special session of Congress will not raise revenue enough to run the Government. If that act fails to produce that result, do not lay it at the door of the old soldier. Go somewhere else and retrench. Go somewhere else and cut down unnecessary and useless expenditures. Do not begin on the great pension roll, the roll of honor, of which every member on this floor, regardless of section, must, in his cooler moments, be proud.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I am willing to give the right of way to this appropriation bill. I am willing to add more to it. I will allow no man to stand on this floor and go further than I will in the protection of that roll of honor in voting pensions or in protecting the credit and the welfare of the old soldier from whatever source attack may come. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, the time has come when we may be fair with each other. My friend from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] wants to know why there are more pensioners on the rolls from Indiana than from Illinois. I challenge the statement that there are more pensioners from Indiana than from Illinois, but if there are, it may be for the proud reason that there were more soldiers from Indiana on the side of the Union in the late war than from Illinois. Whatever the facts may be, if there are more pensioners on the rolls from Indiana than from Illinois, so far as I am concerned I do not desire in any way to cover it up.

I am glad of it and proud of it. In my county, which sent forth as many soldiers as any county in the State of Indiana, nearly every man who went forth to do battle is drawing a pension. There are a few who have never applied for pensions who ought to have applied and would have been entitled to them. And, Mr. Chairman, I think I have said to every one of them, for their heroic deeds, for their sacrifice, for their impaired health, they should apply, and that I would use every argument and art of persuasion at my command to see that their pensions were allowed. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the time has come for a service pension.

Mr. Chairman, I would teach the rising generation not only the glories of this nation, but I would show them the sacrifices made by the Union soldier; and when they understand these, instead of complaining of the taxes, they will be ready to take off their hats and do obeisance to the men who made it possible for us to have the united Government that we have to-day. One people, one Constitution, one flag, one common interest; no North, no South, no East, no West, and, Mr. Chairman, but one sentiment upon the floor of the House, and that is, to maintain this great roll of honor and deal justly and generously with the Union soldier. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAMPBELL] so much of my time as he may desire.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I represent a district in Illinois that sent possibly more soldiers into the war for the suppression of the rebellion than any other district in the United States. I rise for the purpose of introducing an amendment to this appropriation bill. I want to be consistent about this matter. I sent in yesterday to the Pension Department forty-nine status requests in the cases of soldiers living in the Twentieth Congressional district of Illinois. Many of these men are Democrats. I am satisfied that there are in my district a great many deserving soldiers who have never received pensions from the Government—men whose names ought to be upon the pension rolls. For this reason I propose to introduce an amendment to this bill, so that there will be enough money appropriated to pay all pensioners, so that no deficit will exist at the end of the next fiscal year. I send the amendment to the desk, and ask that it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "forty," in line 2, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty;" so as to read "$150,000,000."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not understand this amendment is in order at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been read merely for the information of the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL. When this portion of the bill is reached I will offer that amendment. I want to be consistent. I think there is as much patriotism on this side of the House as upon the other. We are all patriotic. We love our Government. We love our country. We all feel like doing what is right for the soldiers of the Union, and the widows of such soldiers. And to do this, we ought to appropriate a sufficient amount of money to pay these pensions. I find upon examining the report of the hearings before the subcommittee which prepared this bill, on page 4, that the Commissioner of Pensions gave it as his estimate that on the basis of an appropriation of $140,000,000 there would be a deficit of $8,337,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899. The Commissioner went even further than this—he said it was possible the deficit would be as much as $10,000,000.

Now, I know that the Commissioner is well informed in regard to these matters and I am willing to accept his estimate as correct. It seems to me that it is absurd to appropriate less money than will be needed. Surely we do not want a deficit amounting to as much as $10,000,000 to occur in the pension list. Let us be honest with the veterans and ourselves. Mr. Chairman, at the proper time I shall urge the adoption of the amendment I have just proposed.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, one or two statements have been made by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber which, it seems to me, ought to be corrected. One of those statements was that of the gentleman from Tennessee, who said that of this colossal sum of $140,000,000, caused by the pension appropriation bill, only 5 per cent was paid in States that furnished soldiers to the Confederate army. That statement was an error on the part of the gentleman. But even if it were correct, I do not know that it ought to be an argument against the payment of pensions. As one reason why a larger percentage of this sum was not paid in those States, it might be suggested that the gentlemen who reside in those States did not at the proper time see fit to qualify themselves for places on the pension roll by enlisting in the Federal Army. That might be an all-sufficient answer.

But the gentleman by an argument of that kind endeavors to arouse a spirit of sectionalism. I think that is unfair and is to be deprecated, especially when he bases his argument upon a misstatement of facts. As a matter of fact, to soldiers residing in the States that made contributions to the Confederate armies there are paid annually $27,000,000 of the sum appropriated for pensions—nearly 20 per cent of the entire amount appropriated for that purpose. I allude to this merely because of the unfairness, as it seems to me, of the gentleman in attempting to make this pension bill odious to the American people.

The gentleman from Alabama has offered an amendment which shows, to my mind, that he has a misconstruction of the whole theory of pensions. Pensions are not granted as a reward for service, but their purpose is to equalize, as nearly as possible, the earning capacity of the men who are injured in the military service and those who are not. The Government says to a man about to enlist, "If, having taken your place in the ranks, you should suffer such disability as partially or wholly to incapacitate you for earning a livelihood, we will, by a pension, make good that loss." That is the theory upon which pensions are allowed.

The gentleman's amendment proposes to make the period of the soldier's service a measure of the amount of pension to be allowed, without regard to the disabilities suffered by the individual or the incapacity incurred by him for earning a livelihood. Why should not a man receive a full pension, whether incapacitated during the first three months of his service or during the last three months? If he is in fact incapacitated—rendered less able to earn a living than if he had not engaged in the service—why should not the Government make good the loss which he has suffered? Yet the gentleman proposes that the soldier who served for four years shall receive the full amount of pension; that one who served only three years shall receive three-fourths of the full amount; or if two years, two-thirds; or if one year, one-half. Is such a provision just to a man who, having served only one year, has really been incapacitated from earning to as great a degree as the one who served four years? A provision of that kind, it appears to me, sets at defiance the whole theory upon which pensions are allowed.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] to a remark that fell from him. I think perhaps it was not well considered. I do not believe that any American citizen will dare to stand in the face of the American people and utter a slander or libel or foul aspersion upon the honor of good men, as did the gentleman from Ohio if he meant what he stated and is correctly reported by the Official Reporters of the House. Let me call attention to the language, Mr. Chairman. I heard it as it fell from the lips of the gentleman; but to be sure, so as not to make any mistake with regard to a statement of such wonderful gravity, I went to the Official Reporter and got from him the exact language as uttered by the gentleman from Ohio. He said:

By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made most soldiers either stand upon the rejected roll or commit moral and legal perjury to reach the roll.

That is the language of the gentleman from Ohio. Will he stand by that?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I do, with the exception of one word. I think I used the word "many" for "most." I stand by my language in every particular. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the language that I have quoted was the language the gentleman from Ohio used. I have repeated the language that was used by the gentleman without change of a single syllable or word. The gentlemen all around me heard the monstrous statement. No man could be mistaken about it. Words like those will burn themselves into the memories of all honest, patriotic men in an assemblage like this.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman repeat the language he asserts that I used? I could not hear distinctly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I will repeat the language, although it ought to be enough to bring the blush of shame to any man to think that language of this kind could be uttered—perhaps even repeated—on the floor of this House. But I will repeat the gentleman's language. The gentleman said:

By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made most soldiers——

Mr. NORTON of Ohio (interrupting). Now, change that word "most" to "many"——

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing)—

either stand upon the rejected roll or commit moral and legal perjury to reach the roll.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Change the one word "most" to "many," and you will have my exact language—the language I intended to use.

Mr. HEPBURN. Ah, but "most" was the word you used. We have been familiar with the word "many," used in that connection, during a long period of years. You were the first one, to my knowledge, that specified approximately the number of perjuries committed by your old comrades in order to get the pension or to get upon the rolls. I do not wonder, sir, that the gentleman tries to get away from the consequences of his own rash statement.

Gentlemen say that the pension roll is a roll of dishonor. Is it now? We had an Administration that pledged itself to the purging of the pension rolls—two of them—four years, and again another period of four years, in which they devoted themselves to removing the blots, as they called them, from the pension rolls of the United States.

Did they succeed? It might be that some years ago, prior to the year 1885, there may have been in some cases vague and misty suspicions here and there and elsewhere that there was a man on the roll who ought not to be there. But in 1885 the Democratic party, through its Administration then in power, began the labor of "purging the pension rolls." They kept it up uninterruptedly for four years, and assuming that nothing was done in that direction during the succeeding four years, in 1893 again they began the congenial work of "purging the pension rolls," and for four years more went on with the work. All the spies, all the informers everywhere that had the disposition to malign or injure an old neighbor were eagerly listened to by the officials in charge of the administration of the law.

From year to year they went on with the work, and at times were reenforced by all the Democratic postmasters in power. Much money was spent in the hunt, and everywhere these gentlemen gave voice to all the suspicions that suspicious neighbors might have as to the integrity and honor of their neighbors who were pensioners, all of these coming to the Pension Department and all finding willing and eager ears, every attention being given to the rumors, suspicions, and falsehoods that could be invented, examinations being had upon all of them; and yet after all of this labor, with the aid of all the courts, with the expenditure of millions of money directed to "purging the pension rolls," you could almost count on the fingers of your hands the result of the labors of all these gentlemen for each of the years they were thus engaged.

Now, as I have said before, there might have been a time when aspersions of this kind could be listened to with something like tolerance, but that time has passed, gentlemen. I want to remind you that you have no right now to make these charges, because the issues were made up by you, the trial has been had, the verdict has been rendered, and you ought to be precluded, now at least, after all these years of effort and all these years of failure, from again making this stale, unwholesome, and malevolent charge. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I do not know how many more gentlemen desire to speak upon this question, but unless there are some more on one or the other side of the House——

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I would like a little time.

Mr. MAXWELL. I ask leave to offer an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio desire?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I simply want to reply very briefly to the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Go on.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am not only surprised, but pained as well, by the language of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. I had learned to admire and respect him upon the floor of this House, learned to admire and respect him before I came upon the floor of this House; but I did not know then that there was any man upon the floor of this House who would insist upon putting words into the mouth of any member upon this floor for the paltry, mean, and despicable purpose of getting something upon which to base a reply. I thought, Mr. Chairman, that the dignity and the ability and the manhood of the gentleman from Iowa gave him sufficient grounds to meet all men in debate upon this floor without manufacturing or insisting upon the use of a word, and that at least when he had the assurance that I had not so proclaimed it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the gentleman from Iowa that my respect for the soldier has been proven upon too many fields, public and private, for him to attack the record in any form to do me injury. I stand repeating only what the veterans of Ohio, in the soldiers' homes, along the lines everywhere repeat, that the rolls of the Pension Office and the provisions of the law require them to furnish testimony that they can not get or be rejected; and I say, though you were a comrade, though you had the genius and the brains of the greatest physician that ever lived, you dare not put your name to a pension certificate and swear that at this place and at that time you know the soldier contracted heart disease; or if you do it, you commit a moral perjury if not a legal one. I complain of your pension laws solely because they are against the soldier. I am not complaining of the pension laws because they are in favor of him. I am trying to sweep away the cobwebs and the useless machinery, and that dovetail system of work that keeps on and on forever.

Now, I will say to you, sir, if you love the soldier as much as you pretend, put your energy and your genius to a work that will clean up that roll and let men who have been waiting for nine years for an answer hear some word and some report and some favor out of the mouths of those who pretend to be the soldiers' friends. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Do business and stop prating. Bay not to the moon of the pretended loyalty and glory and dignity of yourselves. Get down to work. Go into the Pension Committee room, if you dare, and make a proposition to me there that I do not prove to you, a thousand—nay, two thousand—upon your rolls that they have not heard a word from in six or seven years. And I say, and repeat it now, that many of the best boys that ever carried a musket, that ever went upon any field, that for three years were always at the front, came home weak, wounded, debilitated, and impoverished, and some of them charges upon the public, can not get upon the rolls because of the iron rule that you have, the iron law that is there, as senseless as it is strong, which stands in their way.

I am not afraid to speak the truth here upon this subject. It is a strange condition! If you love the soldier so greatly and so mightily, and if you desire to do right by him, why, in the name of Heaven, do you not clear away the army of cormorants and pension attorneys that dog him on every hand, to rob him of his sustenance, and at last notify him, through the Commissioner of Pensions, that his claim is rejected because he could not prove an absolute, clear record of his military service and of injury while in the line of duty?

I say to you, sir, that I am not afraid to stand upon the record and leave it to the campfires and the boys around the burning logs. I am not afraid to stand upon the record and leave it to the masses of the soldiers of the land. I tell you now, once for all, your soldiers' homes are crowded to overflowing, and men in my own State have been working in the soldiers' homes pounding stone, employing a part of them and deducting a part of their pension money. This is being done in Erie County, Ohio. I may be charged with making a mistake when I say that. I say it is a shame and a stain upon your lawmaking power for you, with that majority, to permit such a condition of things as this.

I say that because justice is not done that there are thousands who are humiliated from day to day and are either eating the bread of charity or going hungry on the street. I speak for them. I speak for their honor, their dignity, and in the justice of a just country, with a just God, and just people, who do not love their political gods above honesty to mankind and general humanity. I conferred with them, and carry to you the words they spoke. I have the courage of my convictions to speak upon this floor the language which they spoke to me.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. When you had the President, the Senate, and the House, why did you not remedy some of the evils you complain of?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. When we had the President, the only one which the misfortune of God or of the country has given to the Democratic party since the war [laughter and applause on the Democratic side], we got a man that belonged to you, and you owned him. [Renewed laughter and applause.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Remedies do not begin with the President, they begin with Congress. You could have passed bills. You had the only power to do it; but instead of that, you devoted your attention as a party to reducing pensions and suspending the payment of pensions, and it does not lie in your mouths to complain of existing irregularities and improper laws.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, because we committed a wrong, a wrong which I inveighed against and complained of then as bitterly as I do now, is no sign that you should sit supinely in your places and see the evils that exist and not have the courage or the manhood to correct them now that you have the power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I have heard of no amendment coming from that side of the House that will correct any of these evils.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. If this side of the House were to propose an amendment that would give a crown of glory to every soldier, you would vote against it, and you would steal the crown from him. He would not get away with it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] has accused me of a very grave offense, that of interpolating a word in his speech in order that I might make a fitting reply to it. Mr. Chairman, I make an absolute and total denial of that charge. I have not done that. The gentleman says that I ought to have taken his word when he says that he used the word "many" instead of the word "most." I heard the gentleman; I heard him use the word "most." I was giving him my undivided attention. The fact that he used that word made an impression upon my mind about which I can not be mistaken. I am reenforced in this conclusion by the statements of gentlemen all around me who were paying attention to him and who heard him use that word "most."

Still, anxious to be correct beyond peradventure, although I did not think it possible that I could be in error, I went to the Reporter, and have repeated here the words as he heard them and as he wrote them down, standing near to the gentleman. I have not committed the offense that he says I committed. Mr. Chairman, on the contrary, the gentleman, with all his boasted courage, with all his passionate desire to dare somebody to do something or other that perhaps they never thought of doing—with all that, the gentleman is now trying to get away from the slur and stigma that he put upon thousands, tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands of honest men whose names are on the pension roll. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move that the committee do now rise, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MAXWELL. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. We have not reached that stage in the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can have it read for the information of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Very well. I will yield for that purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the total appropriations for pensions for 1899 by inserting $165,000,000 in place of $141,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4303) making appropriations for invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1899, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of John Snyder, Fifty-third Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The bill (S. 809) for the relief of Orin R. McDaniel, which had been referred to the Committee on War Claims, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the Board of Engineers on examination and character and value of improvements made at the Pass of Aransas, Texas, by the Aransas Pass Harbor Company—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 10, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. HENDERSON on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, that committee was discharged from further consideration of the following-named bills; which were referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. 1586) to amend section 3331 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

A bill (H. R. 2580) to dispense with proof of loyalty in certain cases—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 3821) to prohibit the sale of convict-made goods unless branded as such—to the Committee on Labor.

CORRECTION.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the RECORD. In the proceedings of yesterday, on page 67 of the daily RECORD, I find an error which is perhaps important because of a colloquy that occurred on the floor. I find in the remarks of a member, as printed in the RECORD, this language:

> You demand of a soldier now more than you demand of anyone on God's earth, before any court in the land, or before any committee. By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made many soldiers either stand upon the rejected roll or commit moral and legal perjury to reach the roll.

The language that was used by the gentleman, instead of what I have read, was as follows——

Mr. BAILEY (interrupting). Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me while I suggest that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] from whose remarks the gentleman has read is not now in his seat, and that it might be well to postpone this matter until he returns to the Hall. He is in the city, and as he generally attends upon the sessions of the House, I am sure he will be here to-day.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will allow me to conclude my statement, I will agree to let it go over. The language that was used by the gentleman from Ohio was as follows:

You demand of a soldier now more than you demand of anyone on God's earth, before any court in the land, or before any committee. By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made most soldiers either stand upon the rejected roll or commit moral and legal perjury to reach the roll.

It is suggested, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman directly interested in this matter is not now in his seat, and if, without losing the opportunity of making this correction, the matter can be passed for the present, I am content.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Ohio was here this morning, but has gone to the train to meet his family and will probably return in a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the matter will be suspended for the present.

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE COOKE.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 18th day of December, 1897, be set apart for paying tribute to the memory of Hon. EDWARD DEAN COOKE, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Illinois.

The resolution was adopted.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ASSIGNMENT OF CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts is hereby authorized and directed to designate the committees to which the clerks provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, should be allowed and assigned for the present Congress, and to report by resolution to the House for its action thereon.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that resolution to give power to the Committee on Accounts to assign these clerks?

Mr. ODELL. That is the object of the resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. Has that been the usual custom?

Mr. ODELL. It has been the usual custom.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I would like to hear the resolution read again.

The resolution was again read, and was then adopted.

On motion of Mr. ODELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for further consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of House bill No. 4303, the pension appropriation bill. General debate has not been closed.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration here contains a provision making an appropriation to pay members of the boards of examining surgeons that the Commissioner of Pensions, under the law, is authorized to appoint. Some of this money that will be appropriated by this bill, should it become a law, will be used to pay the fees and compensation of members of boards of examining surgeons appointed under the Administration of President Cleveland. It so happens, Mr. Chairman, that in the Congressional district which I have the honor to represent there are six counties. In four of those counties, under the operation of this civil-service law, the present Commissioner of Pensions has been authorized to appoint boards, and he has appointed them. In four of those counties he has appointed boards of examining surgeons, while in two of those counties—Greene and Clermont—under the civil-service law, he is not able to remove the boards that are now in existence.

In the county of Warren, in which I live, and which is full of old soldiers who defended the flag that you sit by, the Commissioner of Pensions was able to create a new board—a board composed of physicians who are friendly to the soldiers of that county, and who, the soldiers believe, will do them justice in the examinations made by them, while in the county of Greene, an adjoining county, that has to-day residing within its limits about 1,000 veterans of the war of 1861, the Commissioner of Pensions is powerless to create a new board, and that by reason of this abomination which is known as the civil-service law of the United States. [Applause.]

I make no specific charge of wrongdoing against any member of the board of examining surgeons in the county of Greene; but I do know this, that the old soldiers of that county believe they are not fairly treated by that old board, and it is their wish, as I have been able to ascertain it, almost without an exception, that the present Commissioner of Pensions be authorized to create a new board in that county that would at least be in sympathy with the old soldiers and friendly to their just efforts to recover what is due them under the pension laws of this Government.

Mr. Chairman, what sort of a beautiful thing is it that we see in this civil-service law, that in my county of Warren the Commissioner is enabled to create a new pension board in harmony with the purpose, as we believe, of this Administration to manifest its friendship for the men who saved this Government, while as to an adjoining county of the same Congressional district, when I go to the Commissioner of Pensions, as I have done, and ask that a board be appointed composed of three physicians, all of whom have splendid records in the war for the Union, he tells me, as he did this morning, that he is powerless to make the change, and powerless because of what I a moment ago denounced and again denounce as the abomination known as the civil-service law of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish, nor will I for a moment seek to divert this discussion from the legitimate and proper channel in which it proceeded yesterday; but I think I do not do that when in this particular matter, in view of this provision of the pending measure, I assert, in the name of 3,000 old veterans of the Sixth Congressional district of Ohio, that they regard this as unfriendly and unjust legislation—as something that ought to be remedied; and they come now to say that they ask that any law under which their affairs are administered as they are under this law, in the matter of the examining boards, be repealed or very severely modified.

Mr. Chairman, while I have the honor of addressing the House on this subject, I want to add a word or two that possibly goes a little outside of the legitimate scope of a discussion like this. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] a few days ago to say that he would be content to allow the civil-service law to remain in operation in the city of Washington and in the Departments therein located.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me, I said we might be willing to put the law back in the Departments where it was as administered immediately after its enactment; and then I was careful to say, "More than this we may not ask; less than this we will not take."

Mr. BROWN. Possibly I did not fully understand the words which were so well used by the gentleman from Ohio; but I intended to say that if he went so far as that, he was going further than I am willing to go in any concession I have to make with reference to this civil-service law. I want to say here for the 3,000 old veterans that live in the Sixth Congressional district of Ohio that, speaking for them, I do not acknowledge, I do not admit that the civil-service law ought to remain in operation in one single Department of this Government, whether it is located in the city of Washington or elsewhere. There are many of those old veterans who are capable of coming to Washington and taking places as messengers and other officers in the Departments here. During the little time that I have had the honor to be a member of this House I have received many letters from soldiers in our district, some of them now in the Dayton Home, asking if there is not something here that they may be permitted to do. Sir, there are positions in these Departments here the duties of which those old soldiers could discharge in an admirable manner; but when I go to a Department and ask that something be given them, I am met with the answer that under this astonishing, this absurd, this outrageous civil-service law the old veteran I represent may obtain a ticket for his home in Ohio if he can, but the best thing he can do is to return there as soon as possible.

I am not ready to admit that the law ought to remain in operation in the Departments at Washington or in the departments of this Government anywhere else. I am not in favor of a total abolition of the civil-service law; but when I see it operate, as it does operate, against the men for whom we are legislating by this bill, I am moved to denounce it as I have done here.

And now, Mr. Chairman, one word more. If I understood the other day the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] aright, we are to be told there is in this something of a question of party loyalty; that in some way a man is not a good Republican at this day unless he subscribes to what the gentleman was pleased to term a cardinal principle of the Republican party, to wit, the principle, if it has any, of the civil-service law.

Mr. Chairman, in this connection I ask that there may be read at the Clerk's desk a resolution that was adopted by the last State convention of the Republican party of Ohio, at Toledo, in June last.

The Clerk read as follows:

We denounce the violation of the spirit of the civil-service act by President Cleveland in those orders which extended its operation beyond its purposes and intent, and demand such revocation of orders, or modification of the law, as will accomplish its manifest purpose.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, that resolution was unanimously reported from the committee on resolutions of our last State convention, and when read to the convention, one of the largest and most intelligent and most enthusiastic conventions that ever met in our State, it was received with every mark of indorsement and approval. It is a denunciation of the manner in which this civil-service law has been administered, and I wish now to say, with all due respect to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], that we have in our State a species of Republicanism that does not regard the civil-service law as a cardinal principle, or any other sort of principle, of the great Republican party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I want to say another thing, with the very kind indulgence of the House, and I had not really any right to expect its indulgence for so long a time. I wish to say another thing, that with all of the regard we entertain for the President of the United States—one of our own citizens and one of our very best citizens, one of our greatest citizens—I believe he is mistaken when he says that the civil-service law has the approval of the people. I point him, and those here who appear ready to crack the party whip over our heads, to the fact that that act—the civil-service law—does not have the approval of the people of the State of Ohio. I have undertaken during the last few months to make myself acquainted with the sentiment of the Republicans from my Congressional district on this particular subject. During the summer we had a senatorial convention—a convention composed of delegates of four of the counties of the southern portion of the State of Ohio—and that convention adopted a resolution denouncing in the strongest possible terms this civil-service act, and assailing the manner in which it has been administered.

I want to say further, Mr. Chairman, that the press of the Sixth Congressional district of Ohio is, I believe, unanimously opposed to this law. The Journal, of Wilmington, one of the ablest of the Republican papers in my district, uses these words in referring to the law:

The outrageous civil-service rules.

That is the manner in which that paper alludes to this law.

The Courier, the leading paper of another county in my district (Clermont), denounces the act as—

This monstrous measure.

The Gazette, published at Xenia, uses this language, and I commend it and the sentiment it embodies to those gentlemen here who state that this act has the approval of the Republican party in the State of Ohio:

When the head officers of the Government come in on the spoils system, so called, it is a monumental inconsistency for them to hold back their friends who want subordinate positions by such a subterfuge.

And this is one of the things that the gentleman from Indiana announces as a "cardinal principle" of the Republican party.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Is the Cincinnati Gazette a leading Republican paper of the State of Ohio?

Mr. BROWN. It is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Is it not the leading Republican paper of that State?

Mr. BROWN. I am not prepared to say that it is the leading Republican paper of the State of Ohio. It is a leading paper——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Are you aware of the fact that it applauds the utterances of the President of the United States with reference to this question?

Mr. BROWN. I am not aware that it applauds the civil-service act in any manner. I am not able to read it every day. I will leave that, however, to the gentlemen who represent the districts in which Cincinnati is located. I speak especially for the Sixth Congressional district of Ohio, with the people of which I claim to have some acquaintance. I have some knowledge of their sentiments on this question. They do not think this is a cardinal principle of the Republican party——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I understood him to say that he spoke for the Republican party of the State of Ohio. He now says he applies his remarks to the people of his district.

Mr. BROWN. The gentleman does not require my pardon. Possibly I did use such an expression. But I will say now to the gentleman, and to the House, that the Republicans of Ohio, 95 per cent of them, yes, I will go one better than the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] who said the other day, as I understood him, that east of the Alleghany Mountains 95 per cent of the people were opposed to this act, I will go one better and say that 96 per cent of those people are opposed to it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Then it seems the gentleman does assume to speak for the Republicans of the State of Ohio, and my question with reference to the Commercial Gazette of that State was an entirely pertinent question.

Mr. BROWN. Very well; that may be. I am not running the Commercial Gazette at this time, but if the gentleman from Indiana has an editorial or a clipping from that paper applauding this act, I will give him a part of my time in which to read it for the benefit of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Or, if he can quote from such an editorial from memory, I will give him a bit of my time now in which to tell us the vigorous phrases with which the Commercial Gazette, of Cincinnati, or the Commercial Tribune defends this abomination, which the gentleman from Indiana has christened here a cardinal principle of the party that first elected Abraham Lincoln President of the United States. [Applause.] I am astonished at the names that are used here. I understand the doctrine of a sound currency, the doctrine of protection to American industries, to be cardinal principles of the Republican party, and if I should show a readiness to be untrue to them I should expect the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] to rise in his place and crack his little party whip over my head, and I should shrink under it in terror.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Now, if the gentleman——

Mr. BROWN. But when he rises here to announce as a cardinal principle of the Republican party the law under which not one of the 3,000 old veterans of my district can get a place which he is competent to fill because of that act, I beg leave to dissent from the gentleman's view. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. If the gentleman will permit me, I shall not take issue with him that Abraham Lincoln was the first President of the Republican party. But I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he is fighting a man of straw. I asked the gentleman if he did not know that the Commercial Gazette had applauded the utterances of the President on the civil-service question. I did not say that it had applauded the civil-service law.

Mr. SHATTUC. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. SHATTUC. Does he understand that convention at Toledo represented probably the sentiments of the Ohio Republicans, or that the Commercial Gazette did?

Mr. BROWN. I understood that that expression which has been read at the Clerk's desk represented the Republican sentiment of the State of Ohio.

Mr. SHATTUC. May I ask you another question?

Mr. BROWN. Let me say, first, that it was on that platform that in an off year we waged something of an uneven fight and elected our candidate for governor, General Bushnell, by about 30,000 majority and elected a legislature which will return to the Senate of the United States for the full term Hon. MARCUS A. HANNA. [Applause.] There was nothing in that declaration that injured the Republicans of Ohio in the campaign through which we have just passed——

Mr. SHATTUC. Was there one of the 110 delegates from Hamilton County who did not vote for this resolution?

Mr. BROWN. There was not one of the 110 delegates from Hamilton County who did not vote for that resolution, so far as I know, and I add that there was not one delegate in that convention from any of the eighty-eight counties in Ohio who voted against that resolution or objected to its language. Now, what becomes of the question of party loyalty?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. BROWN. What becomes of it, I say?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman from Ohio does not seem to desire to be interrupted.

Mr. BROWN. I say here that I stand on that plank of the Ohio platform, and I stand upon that not simply in the interest of the old soldiers of the Sixth Ohio Congressional district. There are young men in Ohio, there are young men in the Sixth Congressional district of Ohio, turned out from our splendid educational institutions, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] said the other day very properly, who feel that they ought to have something to say and do in the administration of the affairs of this Government. At this very day, Mr. Chairman, there is from the town of Lebanon, where I reside, a gentleman serving in the Treasury Department here who was appointed in 1868. He has been in that place ever since, and he feels that he owns it and that he has a title in fee simple to it. He did not originally get in under the civil-service law, but he is kept there now under it.

I go to Wilmington College, or to the Normal University at Lebanon, which during a generation have been turning out well-educated young men to take their places in the affairs of the world, and I find young men worthy in every respect, who would like, for a little time, to serve the Government in some of these Departments here or elsewhere; and when I humbly suggest to the head of a Department that I would like such an appointment made, I am met, as I have been met this day, with the assertion that that particular place has been occupied and possessed ever since 1868. That is another one of the examples of what we have under what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] terms a cardinal principle, a bottom principle, of the great Republican party of this country. Mr. Chairman, if disloyalty to this civil-service law is disloyalty to the Republican party, then I am disloyal to the party, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] and all others who think as he does can make the most of it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I only want to add a word. I was reading a moment ago what the press of my Congressional district has to say of this law. The Republican, at Xenia, says:

> As to the present civil-service law, there is a pretty general consensus of opinion that it ought to be abolished or greatly modified.

Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged to the House for its indulgence. I simply want to say now, on the particular bill before us for consideration, that the civil-service law shows in its operation that it is not satisfactory and that it ought not to be satisfactory to that class of people, the old soldiers of the country, for whom we are legislating in the passage of this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I would like, before any other gentleman addresses the committee, to try and arrange with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] as to the time to be consumed by the House in general debate; and I will ask unanimous consent of the House that general debate be closed at 3 o'clock, if agreeable to him.

Mr. ALLEN. That is agreeable to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be closed at 3 o'clock to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. MAXWELL. I object.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. What time would suit the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. MAXWELL. I wish to give everyone an opportunity to speak who desires to do so.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The objection is withdrawn, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. But the committee has decided to rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4303, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, first, that general debate on the bill pending be closed at a quarter past 3 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that general debate on the pending bill be closed at a quarter past 3. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. I think 3 o'clock is late enough.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. There are some requests for a little additional time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The question was stated.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Before that is put, I wish it understood that I am to control the time on this side of the House and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] on the other, the time to be equally divided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania further asks unanimous consent that the time in committee be controlled by him and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate upon the pending bill, by order of the House, closes at 3.15, the time to be equally divided, and to be controlled on one side by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] and on the other by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL].

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to take any part in this debate. I expect to vote for this appropriation bill exactly as it comes from the committee. I fully indorse many of the statements made by my distinguished colleague from the Sixth Ohio district, especially in regard to these boards of pension examiners. We have two boards of pension examiners in the city of Cincinnati, made up, each of them, of three Democrats, who, in accordance with the language of the late Commissioner of Pensions, were appointed under the theory that if two Democrats on that board were good, three were better. We also have in our county one board of pensioner examiners in my district and one in the district of my colleague [Mr. SHATTUC], who have been appointed by the present Commissioner of Pensions.

I find that the old soldiers of Cincinnati are coming to me with requests by the dozens, I might almost say by the hundreds, asking permission to appear before the pension examiners who have been appointed by this Administration. It shows the desire on the part of the old soldier to be excused from appearance before Democratic boards. I believe that the universal sentiment of the soldiers of my district is that these two Cincinnati boards should be removed, and in their place should be appointed three physicians who are in sympathy with the soldier. To that extent I fully agree with the distinguished gentleman who has just preceded me.

I agree with him, and I agree with the resolution which he sent to the desk and which was adopted by the State convention of Republicans of Ohio, that the spirit and intent of the civil-service law was violated by Grover Cleveland in his last and other orders; and I believe that the work that he did under these orders should be undone and the evils remedied by the Republican, the Ohio Republican President, who now occupies the seat of the Chief Executive of this nation. But when the gentleman from the Sixth Ohio district professes to speak, in the broad language which he has used, for all the Republicans of Ohio, and more particularly for the Republicans of the district which I represent, and to deny that the principle of civil service, when properly administered by this Government, is a cardinal principle of the Republican party, and when he says that it is universally denounced by the Republicans of my district, I beg leave to assure this House that he has gone too far.

The Republicans of the city of Cincinnati, with the exception, possibly, of a very few who are office seekers, indorse the true principle of civil service in the administration of the affairs of this Government. To hear the gentleman speak, one would imagine that if these places were taken out of the civil-service rules every Ohio applicant would find a place in one of the Departments or in some Government office. The gentleman forgets that Ohio to-day has at least her proportion of appointees in the various Departments of this Government. He forgets that if the civil service "reform" which he advocates, wiping out the law now upon the statute book, should be put into effect—he forgets that from his district, from my district, and from every other Ohio district would be turned out men who, by their experience and their long service, are better fitted to perform the work of the offices which they fill than would be the new men who would be appointed merely because they were able to control a few votes in a primary.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like five minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Very well; but it may be necessary to extend the time for the debate.

Mr. BROMWELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be misunderstood as to my position in this matter. I am in favor of a reformation in the present civil-service administration. I believe that the 40,000 appointees who were placed under the civil-service rules by President Cleveland's order should be put back upon the same basis that other applicants occupied at that time. I do not believe in filling up the offices of this Government with friends of the party in power and then, by Executive order, covering them up and giving them life positions in those offices. I believe that Grover Cleveland, though he professed to be a friend of the civil service, did more to discredit the civil-service system of this Government than any other man did or could have done. I believe that the reformation of the civil service may be safely left to the President of the United States who is now occupying that high office.

For myself and for the Republicans of my district, we only ask that the service which is rendered by the officers of this Government shall be the best for the Government, without reference to the particular emoluments or the advantage to individuals. I believe that life tenure in civil office should be abolished. We elect our teachers in our schools for a term of years, and from time to time they are required to be examined as to their qualifications. We elect the President of the United States for four years, Senators of the United States for six years, and members of this House for two years. Every officer elected by the people is elected for a definite term of service, and I believe that the same rule should apply to every department of the Government. Instead of the civil service giving a life tenure, I would favor a tenure for a limited number of years. Then throw the places open to competition by examination. Let competition come from the outside as well as from the inside, and make the examinations practically on the work of the office, and not give such questions as have made our civil-service examinations ridiculous.

Let every man have an opportunity to compete at the end of four years, or six years, or whatever term may be established. If the man in the office, owing to the experience which he has acquired in the service, is not able to stand higher in the examination than an outsider who comes to the examination without the advantage of experience, then I say the man in the office ought to step down and out and make place for the better man. If the outsider is able to show that he is better qualified to discharge the duties of the position, he should be given the opportunity. To that extent I am willing to go in reforming the present civil-service system.

But if the "reform" means wiping out the whole system, putting us back where we were thirty years ago, where the offices were the party spoil not only of the head of the party, but of every member of Congress of every subordinate officer, of every Department chief or head, then I say the Republican party can not afford to take that step backward and ignore the improvement in the Government service that has resulted from the civil-service system. This far, Mr. Chairman, I think I should go in stating my position as a Representative of one of the great Cincinnati districts, and I feel as well satisfied as that I stand here that in taking this position I represent the sentiments of the thinking, conscientious, patriotic Republicans of the Second Ohio district. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman from Ohio occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MAXWELL].

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Chairman, I introduced yesterday an amendment, which was read, proposing an appropriation of $165,000,000 in place of the $141,000,000 carried by this bill. I am in favor of a liberal pension law and of having it liberally construed. The gentlemen who have spoken this morning have diverged from the question and have discussed civil service reform. I think it would have been better if they had confined themselves to the matter under discussion.

Our nation, from its first organization, has recognized its obligations to the soldiers who had imperiled their lives in fighting its battles. Hence we find the infant Republic, although carrying a heavy debt when we consider its means of payment, making what was deemed ample provision for those who had fought her battles.

The same rule was applied to the volunteers of the Mexican war, and ex-soldiers of that war all over this broad land are still drawing well-deserved pensions for their services. The civil war was the most gigantic struggle of modern times. In no other nation would it have been possible to marshal, train, and equip such vast bodies of men as went forth in battle array on both sides. And they were not holiday soldiers, but went to fight and, if need be, lay down their lives in the struggle.

The ancient Greeks had a saying that "When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war," but no more bloody and strongly contested fields were ever won than Shiloh, Gettysburg, the Wilderness, and many others that could be mentioned. The men who formed the Union Army were not by any means all Republicans or all Democrats, but a fair proportion of each. The Little Giant, Douglas, defeated as he had been and his rival in the chair of state, rose up like the great man he was and threw his influence, which was great, in favor of maintaining the Union. When the call for volunteers was made by President Lincoln, they came from all parts of the country. The student left his books, the lawyer his briefs, the doctor his patients, the farmer his farm, the merchant, mechanic, and laborer, and all governed by one impulse—to save the Union—pressed forward to the front.

The Army, a nucleus of which was thus formed, was constantly augmented by new recruits until it probably reached a million or more, when victory perched upon our banners. It is not alone on the battlefield that the soldier is exposed to death-dealing agencies. Here, indeed, he may be killed or wounded by cannon or rifle shots or serried charge, but sickness and death may come from exposure, from sleeping in the rain, on the wet ground, or in wet clothing, or from improperly cooked food, from impure water, from fatigue, and many other causes. As a rule, exposure and fatigue are unavoidable, and an army, when on the march or in battle, can give but little attention, as a rule, either to food or drink. There are but few persons, I think, who served any considerable time in the Army whose health was not more or less affected by such service.

The seeds of disease were then sown, which did not develop until declining years and lessened vitality favored their growth. I believe there are very few men who served two, three, or four years in actual service whose lives will not be materially shortened by the service. Of the dead, we know that many have fallen whose premature death can only be accounted for upon the lines indicated, viz, that in consequence of their service the seeds of disease were planted which resulted in their death. And this will answer my friend from Mississippi, who wondered why a man who did not claim a pension ten or twenty years ago should claim it now. The reason is plain, I think, and speaks well for the honesty of the Union soldier, and instead of being used to his disadvantage should be quoted in his favor.

Ten or twenty years ago the disability was not so marked. It was regarded as but of a temporary character and would soon pass away. Now, however, the ailment is increasing and wholly or partially prevents the party from earning a livelihood. The seeds of disease were sown in the service of the country to preserve the Union. Shall we forget these men in their old age and infirmity? God forbid. These veterans will soon be gone. The grave is daily closing over some of them. What we do must be done quickly if we desire to relieve their sufferings and provide for their wants. Do you say that the $165,000,000 in the appropriation proposed by me is a vast sum?

So it is, but there is a great number entitled to pensions under the present laws, and then this is a great nation, with boundless resources. It owes a great debt of gratitude to its ex-soldiers of the Union. It is also under a moral obligation to grant a pension to every one of them who is suffering any disability from the service. We should begin at the other end of the pension roll and ascertain how much we should pay, and then appropriate the necessary amount, and cut down expenses in some other direction. The pension list is but a supplement to the war record, and in fact is a part of it; and as that was a large record, so this is; but let us not shrink from our obligations.

A pension law is remedial in its nature, and according to the well-known rule of construction should be liberally construed. I fear it has not been so construed by any party heretofore. The officers of the Pension Office, from Commissioner down, are pleasant gentlemen, and I doubt not desire to perform their duties by allowing or increasing pensions where justice demands. Let them simplify and modify the rules in furtherance of justice and grant a pension to every worthy applicant; and if we make the appropriation of the sum I have named and thus make possible the allowance of many suspended pensions, many a gallant veteran and his wife and children will rise up and call you blessed.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I propose now to yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will try to get through in fifteen minutes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If the gentleman will do that, I shall be very glad, as there is quite a demand for time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think I can get through in that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to disturb the conditions as they now exist in the matter of debate upon the question of civil service reform. I have enlisted as a follower of my distinguished colleague from the Sixth Ohio district [Mr. BROWN], and shall no longer attempt to blaze the pathway of reform in this direction.

Some of the Ohio delegation perhaps do not exactly agree, but when I listened very carefully to the speech of my colleague from Cincinnati [Mr. BROMWELL] I was reminded very much of the position that a candidate for a very high office in Ohio once got himself into. He was closely examined by a committee of ladies of a temperance society as to his views on the temperance question, and he stated that he had always been in favor of the Maine law. When the information of that statement got out, he was pursued pretty closely by persons holding a different opinion, and he answered that there was one little paragraph that had been omitted from his declaration, and that was that while he was in favor of the law, he was opposed to its enforcement. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to some pertinent suggestions upon this pension appropriation bill. I am not willing that any act or word of mine shall go to fan into life the embers of sectional discord which have happily died out in this country. I shall leave it to others to attempt to make party capital or sectional advantage out of any of these questions. My purpose is to show, in the first place, that the Government of the United States can not be justly criticised for its treatment of the Union soldier. I am not willing that my country, with its mighty power, its enormous wealth, and its great patriotic heart, shall be assailed, while I keep silent, by a charge that there has been unfaithfulness to the soldiers of the Union Army.

Looking forward now to the fiscal year beginning July, 1898, there is an estimated revenue of $390,000,000—the total revenue of this Government for every purpose of expenditure—for the support of the civil list of the Government, for the support of the Army and the Navy, for the construction of fortifications and ships, for the Indian service, for all the mighty bureaus of the Government. And I find an estimated expenditure for the pensions of the soldiers of the war at about $150,000,000—almost one-half of the total expenditure.

I want to call the attention of gentlemen who are talking about the hardship incurred by the soldier in finding relief to a fact that they seem to have entirely overlooked. I refer to the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, for the support of which in the year beginning July, 1896, we have had an expenditure for 1,745 soldiers of $111.60 each, making a total of $1,947,866.40, all of which came out of the Treasury of the United States, and all of which was in addition to this great appropriation in the pension appropriation bill. Then the United States, out of the Treasury, expended more than three-quarters of another million dollars—$777,500—to pay to every State that has a Soldiers' Home $100 a head for all the inmates, making a total for the two departments—first for the National Soldiers' Homes and then for the contributions to the support of the State Homes—of $2,725,366.40.

And in this connection, when the patriotism of the country is assailed, it is well enough to call attention to the enormous expenditures of money that are annually being made in these State Homes for the old soldiers. In Massachusetts one of the model institutions of benevolence in the whole world is their Soldiers' Home. So, too, there are State Homes in New York, in Ohio and Indiana, and in many other States—I will not undertake to name them—one especially in the State of Ohio, filled with veterans of the war, an institution where the Government supplements the generosity of the State of Ohio with $100 apiece for every one of the inmates, and it does the same in all the other States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this pension appropriation is an enormous expenditure. It runs up toward $156,000,000 every year. I want to say a word or two, nevertheless, about a feature of our pension system that I would have different if I could. Nearly three-quarters of a million dollars of this expenditure goes to the support of these pension boards which have been made the football and subjected to the manipulation of political parties, to the detriment of the service. Then we have the expenditures of the great bureaus of the Government here in the city of Washington, amounting altogether to considerably above a million dollars.

I believe that the time has come, and I thought so a long time ago, when it would be vastly better for the Government, and in the long run vastly cheaper for the Government, if some carefully drawn and well-guarded service-pension act were enacted by Congress, so that we would get rid of the whole of this manipulation that has been going on in the country. I do not believe there would be any considerable addition to the pension roll. My friend and colleague on the other side [Mr. NORTON of Ohio] seems to have misconceived the condition of things in the Pension Office. There are nearly a million men and women on the pension roll; but when he speaks of the number who are struggling to get on the pension roll, and who, he says, after all these years, have thus far been unable to get on, the figures which he uses for his illustration include not only the original applications for pension which had been rejected and afterwards allowed, but they cover also the vast number of applications for increase of pension. So that his figures are wholly misleading and his ideas wholly erroneous.

Now, I am going to say a few words in reply to the attack made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] upon the Republican party for its alleged lack of faithfulness to the soldiers of the Union. I heard that same sort of statement made here ten or twelve years ago. Happily, for the intelligence of the country and the good sense of the members of the House, it has not been repeated for a good many years; and when it now came it sounded strangely to me. I am referring to the attack of my colleague, in which he called upon the Republicans to come forward and do their duty by the soldiers of the Union, and told how he dared them to go to an extent that he would not follow. Now, that is strange, Mr. Chairman, but that arises from the fact that the gentleman from Ohio has just arrived here. He was not present in this body for the last ten or fifteen years, and has not heard the discussions on this question, or we should not have heard falling from his lips such statements as he has made.

We have had pension legislation pending before Congress looking to the cure of all the evils which the gentleman has pointed out, and also a vast number that he has not seen fit to consider or that he does not seem to know anything about, and we have the records of the votes of the two political parties upon this question. And just here I am going to call your attention briefly to that record, and I do it with no attempt to criticise and no purpose or desire to stir up any animosity upon the Democratic side. I want to confess here, and will admit, that when the Democrats had possession of a majority here in the House and in the Senate that they have not been remiss in making the general appropriations of money for the soldiers of the country. Therefore I will not enter into any criticism. But when the record of the Republican party is thus assailed and the Republican party held up to the scorn and contempt of the people of the whole world for neglect of duty to the soldiers, I feel called upon to ask the attention of the committee and of the country, if they see fit to look at it, to the record made upon the question about which the gentleman has been talking.

Let me read to you a carefully prepared statement of the various bills that have been pending in the Congress of the United States and to the votes upon them. In the first place, there was a very radical measure pending in Congress some years ago, known as the repeal of the arrears and limitation act, which proposed to have every soldier put upon an equal footing. It would have involved an enormous expenditure of money. But when it was forced on the Republicans of that Congress, they voted, as they have always voted, in favor of the relief proposed. One hundred and sixteen members voted in favor of it; 48 Democrats voted in favor of it; not a single, solitary Republican voted in opposition to it, and 61 Democrats voted against it.

Then came the Mexican-pension act with Senate amendment on the 29th day of January, 1887. I was here then and remember all about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to have five minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will put into my speech this table, and it will commend itself to the attention of all gentlemen here, as to the policy of the Republican party upon all these pension acts.

The table is as follows:

Name of bill.	For pensions.		Against pensions.
	Republicans.	Democrats.	Republicans.	Democrats.
Repeal of arrears limitation, act of Jan. 29, 1879	116	48	None.	61
Mexican pension, Senate amendment, act of Jan. 29, 1887	72	57	1	84
Widows' increase, act of Mar. 19, 1886	118	80	None.	58
Senate bill, 1886, act of ———	27	7	None.	14
Dependent pension bill, Jan. 17, 1887 (H. R. 10487)	114	66	None.	76
Dependent pension bill, over veto, Feb. 24, 1887 (H. R. 10487)	138	37	None.	125
Total	586	295	1	418
PENSION LEGISLATION, 1890.
Dependent parents, Senate, Mar. 31, 1890	32	10	None.	12
Morrill 62-year bill, Apr. 7, 1890	136	34	1	86
Morrill-Cheadle 60-year amendment, Apr. 7, 1890	143	40	None.	71
Morrill 60-year bill, Apr. 7, 1890	141	38	None.	71
Disability, conference, House, June 11, 1890	117	28	None.	56
Disability, conference, Senate, June 23, 1890	31	3	None.	18
Prisoners of war, April 21, 1890	119	24	None.	78

I will summarize the statement by saying that there were cast in all 719 Republican votes on all of these measures in the affirmative and 177 Democratic votes. One Republican alone voted "no" in all of these acts during 1890, and 319 Democrats; and after consolidating all of the votes cast pro and con on these subjects of remedial legislation in Congress we find a total of 1,304 Republican votes cast for pension legislation, and only 2 Republican votes in the negative; and when we combine the Democratic opposition we find 472 votes for pension legislation of the character I have named and 810 against it.

That is the record of the Republican party and of the Democratic party in Congress. The Republican party has shown itself willing to stand almost solidly and unanimously for the interest of the soldier, and many of these complaints that are now here would be readily extinguished by additional legislation were it not for the fact, apparent to all, that the expenditures of the Pension Office have become somewhat enormous, and if the Government is to be run at all, if all Departments are to be supported, concessions must be made in the various Departments for the entire Government, in order that all may be maintained properly.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said this only in response to the attack of the gentleman from Ohio, who has made a most excellent speech for the location from which he comes, and no doubt will be of great benefit to him, and he is entirely welcome to all of the effect that may be derived from it; but I hope in the next speech he makes he will tell the House and the country why his party, which he has so earnestly defended here on the subject of pension legislation, has made the record that it has made and to which I have pointed your attention. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN].

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of this question, I am very much pleased to hear the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] say that he did not desire to stir the embers of sectional strife on this occasion, for the occasion for that had long since passed away. But if the gentleman would only remember yesterday's speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], he would imagine that the same fires were fiercely raging at this very moment. I regret as much as any man the utterances that fell from the lips of the gentleman from Michigan. They were intemperate, unreasonable, and unjustifiable. It occurs to me that this question is not one to call for such an effort as his.

It is a plain business proposition, a matter about which Democrats and Republicans need not differ. So far as concerns the section of the country from which I come, the fact is recognized thoroughly that the soldiers who fought to preserve the Union are entitled under the law to the bounty of the Government, are entitled to pensions, and especially those who received wounds and who contracted disease in the service. We do not expect anything else. We would not change anything that has been done in that regard as to those who were wounded or contracted disease in the service; but when you come with your "dependent-pension" act, and by its terms provide that men who may be worth thousands or hundreds of thousands, yea, even millions of dollars may still draw pensions—pensions that they do not need—we at once ask you whether you gentlemen of the Republican party can afford to stand by and support any such legislation as that.

Is it right; is it honest; is it fair? The purpose and object of the "dependent-pension" law was not to give gifts to those who did not need them. The whole idea, the whole spirit and purpose of that law was to provide a means for those who by reason of advancing years, or by reason of disease contracted after the war, not during the service at all, needed aid and assistance; that they who have not the means of a livelihood should have some provision made for their old age or their decrepitude. But by some strange construction of the law it appears that not only that class is permitted to participate in that bounty of the Government, but the larger class, any and every one who can not make a living by manual labor. It is absolutely forgotten and overlooked that there is a great class who do not need one dollar of the assistance of this great Government.

Now, instead of paying out to that class of those who are denominated "dependent pensioners" the money which they do not need, how much better, how much more honest, and how much more decent would it be if you even increased the pensions of those who fought and bled for their country's cause on the Union side, and who now need the assistance. It occurs to me that this bill, carrying provision for the payment of that class of pensions, can not be voted for by any man who desires to devote the revenues of this Government in a proper way.

We had the statement here yesterday that about $55,000,000 of this appropriation will be expended under the dependent-pension act. Of that a very considerable proportion will go to the class of rich men referred to as "dependent pensioners." Yesterday, in response to the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], I heard the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] practically deny that there was any rich man who was drawing a pension; that there was anybody belonging to the class denominated "the Jay Gould class" who were drawing pensions. Now, I have here an authority that ought to be accepted by the Republican side of this Chamber on this subject, whom I introduce as a witness, and whose word certainly can be accepted as true. He is not a Confederate Democrat either, but a Union soldier. I refer now to the article published in the Washington Post of the 4th instant by General Boynton. I will read only one extract from what he says, and I commend it to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who on yesterday disputed the position taken by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] on this subject.

The extract is as follows:

> There is a growing feeling that the pensions enjoyed by many thousands who are in full health and comfortably fixed in life should be terminated, and the Government be thus enabled to more nearly discharge its duty toward the helpless and the miserable.
> If the pension lists could be printed, every community in the land would be disgusted with its revelations. Wealthy men in large numbers would be found upon it.
> Thousands would be revealed whose disabilities were only temporary and long since disappeared. A small army of men would be discovered to whom their pensions are in no sense a necessity.

He continues in that strain. That is a distinguished Federal officer, certainly a good witness, who is at least entitled to the hearing and credence of the other side of this Chamber. That is what he says with respect to whether rich men are enjoying pensions from this Government, and that under the dependent-pension law, notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. Now, I ask gentlemen on that side of the Chamber whether they are willing to unite with this side of the Chamber to strike from the statute books a provision of law that permits money to be paid out to those who do not need it? Will you join us in striking that out, purging the roll of that class of pensioners who do not need the money, who have already plenty to live upon? If you will join us in that proposition, you will take one step in the right direction and you will hear nothing from us on that subject again. This is but the plain and patriotic duty of every member of this House, whether Democrat or Republican.

Then, again, it was said yesterday, and it is undenied, so far as I have heard, in this Chamber—it was stated by the first speaker on this side of the Chamber that there are cases where widows of soldiers have remarried and years elapsed without any claim being propounded on their part for a pension, but after they had remarried, under the suggestion of the new husband, they for the first time have propounded their claim for a pension or back pay fifteen or twenty or thirty years after the war was over. The statement is made that that class of claims necessitated the payment of about $10,000 a day out of the public Treasury. I heard some gentleman on that side of the Chamber who was fair enough to say that every dollar of that money ought to be withheld.

I ask you again, will you join with us on this side of the Chamber and eliminate that class from the pay roll in the future? We urge you to meet us in the enactment of such a law in the name of common honesty.

Again, a provision was introduced by my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] providing that hereafter the claims of those who are minors shall not be allowed, but shall be denied, unless the claims are filed on or before the passage of this act or during the period of their minority. That provision is a good one, because, as the law now stands, they may wait for years and years, and then, when they are 30 or 40 years of age, they can come in and claim under the pension act as minors of a deceased soldier, long after the necessity for the payment of such a pension has passed away.

You eliminate that, gentlemen, from this bill, eliminate these three classes of claims from this bill, and you will have cut it down many millions of dollars, and each dollar so saved is in the furtherance of justice to the taxpayer. What was the object and purpose of the law providing pensions? The object of the law was manifestly to provide for the contingency that occurs where some one during his service has been injured or rendered less capable of providing for his family, has been injured or contracted some disease by which his capacity to earn a living was impaired or lessened; and yet you see the construction of the law allows many who are rich, as well as those who are poor, to come under the provisions of the act, an idea that never was intended, and in violation of the spirit of the law.

Let us make it plain by denouncing and prohibiting the payment of such sums of money as that in the future. I observe here that $150,000,000, nearly one-half of the entire income of the Government, has to be devoted to the payment of pensions. If you eliminate these, you will lessen the amount by many millions and not have a deficit, as you now have and will continue to have, growing out of this pension fund. The whole idea of giving pensions to those who have not received wounds in the war or contracted any disease during that service is a mistake. To give a pension to a man who left the country's service sound and well, and who may have years afterwards become diseased and unable to perform manual labor, is an outrage upon every man who is taxed to help pay that pension. Its payment is not founded upon justice to the pensioner, but robbery to the taxpayer, and this outrage is but magnified when such pensioner is a man of wealth and counts his dollars by the thousands, as the facts reveal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to yield to the gentleman from Indiana for ten minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to be drawn into another discussion of the civil service this morning. I had supposed that this subject was disposed of for the time being, after the little contest upon this floor between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and myself the other day concerning it. I presumed that it would come up again in the ordinary course of business, at the appropriate time, during the present session for regular discussion, at which time, by the courtesy of the House, I intended and do still intend to submit some extended remarks upon the matter.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], however, has seen fit to bring the matter up for consideration again this morning. Even this fact would not induce me to break silence were it not for the fact that he has also made personal reference to myself. There was so much in what the gentleman said that bore its own refutation upon its very face that I shall not take the time of the House to advert to it, but shall simply confine myself to one of his propositions, to wit: The declaration that my statement, made the other day, that the civil service was a cardinal principle of the Republican party was incorrect.

I presume, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman and myself will have no difficulty in agreeing as to what constitutes a cardinal principle. I understand it to signify an important principle, a material principle, an essential principle. Now, accepting this as a proper definition, I think I shall be amply able to substantiate the declaration I made the other day beyond any question whatever, both to the House and to the country. I know of no more authoritative way, sir, in which to ascertain what is a cardinal principle of a political party than to examine the declarations which it has made on any particular question in its national platforms. It is true that expressions of the party in a county or Congressional district are important evidences of public sentiment in those districts. It is also true that the expression of the people of a party in any particular State, assembled in State convention, is a very high evidence of the condition of public sentiment within the confines of that particular State; but I assume it to be true beyond any reasonable doubt that the declaration of all the Republicans of this great Republic when assembled in their national convention is to be taken as the most conclusive evidence of their sentiments on any particular topic upon which they there express themselves.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to read from the national platforms of the Republican party for the last twenty years on this question. I will read them myself to the House, instead of sending a book to the desk to be read by the reading clerk. Then I will leave to the House and to the country to determine on the issue raised between the gentleman from Ohio and myself as to whether the principle of civil service, sought to be denied by gentlemen from the President's own State, is or is not a cardinal principle of the great Republican party to which we each of us belong. The national platform of 1876 is as follows:

Under the Constitution the President and heads of Departments are to make nominations for office; the Senate is to advise and consent to appointments, and the House of Representatives is to accuse and prosecute faithless officers.

The very doctrine of the Constitution itself.

The best interests of the public service demand that these distinctions be respected; that Senators and Representatives who may be judges and accusers should not dictate appointments to office. The invariable rule in appointments should have reference to the honesty, fidelity, and capacity of the appointees, giving to the party in power those places where harmony and vigor of administration require its policy to be represented, but permitting all others to be filled by persons selected with sole reference to the efficiency of the public service.

Mark the words! Not Republicans nor Democrats nor Populists, but "by persons selected with sole reference to the efficiency of the public service"— and the right of all citizens to share in the honor of rendering faithful service to the country.

The words "right of all citizens," Mr. Chairman, are words the significance of which will certainly not escape the attention of the gentleman from Ohio.

I read now from the Republican platform adopted by that party in national convention in 1880:

The Republican party, adhering to a principle affirmed by its last national convention, of respect for the constitutional rule covering appointments to office, adopts the declaration of President Hayes, that the reform of the civil service should be thorough, radical, and complete.

Where can stronger language be found? A quotation, too, from the language of a Chief Executive from the State of Ohio.

To this end it demands cooperation of the legislative with the executive department of the Government—

I commend that expression to the careful attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]— and that Congress shall so legislate that fitness, ascertained by proper practical tests, shall admit to the public service.

I quote next from the Republican national platform of 1884:

Reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under Republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system, already established by law, to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all Executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the objects of existing reformed legislation should be repealed, to the end that the danger to free institutions which lurks in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided.

Here, Mr. Chairman, we have an explicit claim that civil service reform first saw the light of day under Republican auspices and a declaration favoring its development and extension.

I now call attention to the Republican national platform of 1888. The language is as follows:

The men who abandoned the Republican party in 1884 and continue to adhere to the Democratic party have deserted not only the cause of honest government, of sound finance, of freedom and purity of the ballot, but especially have deserted the cause of reform in the civil service.

I think there are some other and latter-day gentlemen who have likewise deserted the cause of reform in the civil service.

We will not fail to keep our pledges because they have broken theirs or because their candidate has broken his. We therefore repeat our declaration of 1884, to wit: "The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under Republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all Executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided."

Again I quote from the Republican national platform adopted in 1892, briefer than the declaration which I have just read, but directly to the point:

We commend the spirit and evidence of reform in the civil service and the wise and consistent enforcement by the Republican party of the laws regulating the same.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion of this branch of the subject, I quote the last authoritative exposition of what are the real principles of the Republican party upon this question by reading from the national Republican platform adopted at St. Louis, Mo., in the month of June, 1896, and upon which an Ohio man was nominated and elected President of the United States by the free suffrages of the American people:

The civil-service law was placed on the statute book by the Republican party—

Now it is being assaulted by certain gentlemen of the Republican party—which has always sustained it.

And, I may add, parenthetically, always will sustain it.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman state who was the chairman of the committee on resolutions in the national convention which reported that plank among others?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not remember. Will the gentleman kindly inform me?

Mr. BROMWELL. Senator FORAKER.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Well, I imagine that Senator FORAKER would be regarded among the Republicans of Ohio as of at least equal authority to the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR, or to the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. BROWN.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not recently examined the platforms of the Republican party adopted in the various State conventions on this question, but I venture the assertion that, if examined, they will be found to overwhelmingly sustain the declarations set forth in the national Republican platform. More than this, I undertake to say that if you will examine the comments of the Republican newspapers of this country upon the recent message of the President, you will find them overwhelmingly sustaining his utterances upon the subject of the civil service. Mr. Chairman, the civil-service law was of Republican origin, passed when both Houses of Congress were Republican.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all. It was introduced by a Democrat, and a Democratic majority voted for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. No matter who introduced it. The gentleman will concede that the lawmaking power in at least one branch of Congress was Republican at that time, and that a Republican President, Mr. Arthur, approved the law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have my time extended.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. How much additional time does the gentleman want?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. If you give me ten minutes more, I will not exceed it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If the gentleman's time is extended, the House will have to indulge us by giving more time for the general debate, because several gentlemen have yet to be heard. I yield the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I thank the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, another thing. Some of the most conspicuous members of the Republican party have been advocates of civil service reform. Mr. Garfield stood for it. Mr. Hayes fought for it and stood resolutely between the people and the spoilsmen who thought the offices belonged to them instead of to the people, to be administered for the benefit of all our countrymen, regardless of party affiliations. Benjamin Harrison was its earnest advocate and extended it. William McKinley declared for it on this floor, and, if I remember correctly, said that "civil service reform has come to stay." Unless my memory is at fault, he also declared in favor of it in his letter of acceptance and in his inaugural address, and his last authoritative utterance on the subject is to be found in his message, with which utterance I understand the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] most radically disagrees.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I protest that the gentleman ought not to constitute himself the mouthpiece of the President here and then try to get up a conflict between the President and myself.

Mr. GAINES. "Mr. JOHNSON, turn" him "loose."

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I am the last man in the world to seek to make myself the mouthpiece of any person except myself.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then do not put words into my mouth.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Well, if the gentleman does not stand on this floor antagonizing the views of the President in regard to civil service reform, then I have misunderstood every utterance that he has made on that subject.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen who assume that the people are opposed to the civil-service law and want it repealed will find themselves sadly mistaken. The press of this country, that powerful engine for the public good, will be heard from on this topic. The question will be discussed on the floor of both Houses of Congress. The politicians and party workers may desire to overthrow the law, but whenever the issue is submitted to the plain, practical people of this country, who have no selfish interests to subserve, you will find them upholding the hands of the President; and the loyal Republicans on this floor will stand by him in the attitude he has assumed on this subject.

Now, I want to advert briefly to one other matter, and then I shall be through, for I am aware that I am speaking extemporaneously and by the courtesy of the committee, and do not intend to enter into a general argument on this question.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] undertook to give expression to what he said was the sentiment of his own State. I understood him to say that the Republicans of Ohio were opposed to the civil-service system, but when pressed to define his position on this question more definitely he took refuge within the narrow domain of the district which he represents in Congress. I called his attention to the Commercial Gazette, which he finally admitted to be one of the leading Republican papers in Ohio.

There is not a man on this floor who does not know that it is the widest circulated, the best read, and the most authoritative expositor of Republican principles of any of the numerous papers published in that historic State. I said that that paper applauded the President's utterances in his recent message upon the subject of civil service. I say it now. The gentleman challenged me to bring here anything from the editorial columns of that paper and read it. I am now glad to be able to accept his challenge and comply with his request. In substantiation of what I said, I read from an editorial in the issue of that paper of December 7, under the heading "Cuba and the Civil Service." Here is the language:

> The reason why we include the civil-service question among the most important topics discussed in the message is because, according to credible report, a determined effort is to be made by its enemies to abolish the system, either in whole or in part.

The effort is to be made by its enemies to abolish the system either in whole or in part.

Gentlemen must come out into the open. All this talk about "modification" of the law will not go down. They do not dare to attempt the open repeal of the enactment. They seek to attack it covertly—insidiously. They pose as "real civil service reformers" who want to prune the excrescences, but I submit that the real aim and purpose, when we get at the bottom facts, is to destroy the law by piecemeal, if it be not possible to overthrow it at one fell stroke.

This editorial goes on to say:

> Therefore, when we find the President saying, in reference to civil service, that "the system has the approval of the people, and it will be my endeavor to uphold and extend it," we applaud the sentiment, and congratulate the people upon its utterance. The efficient performance of public work is demanded by the people, and a system which insures such efficiency must be steadfastly maintained.
> Taken altogether, we believe that this Presidential message is a representation of national self-control, national aspirations, and national intelligence, which will elevate us as a people, both in our own estimation and in the estimation of our neighbors in the family of sovereign States.

The gentleman from Ohio says that he is not in the habit of reading the Commercial Gazette. I commend him to a careful, thoughtful, and conscientious perusal of the columns of that great paper, assuring him that it will none the less qualify him for the honest, fearless, and capable discharge of his duties on this floor as Representative of a constituency of the great State in which that excellent journal is published.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are many things more in my mind which I might say. But, as I said, I am speaking by the kindly indulgence of the House, and therefore I forbear. The issue is squarely made. I have declared that the principles of the civil-service law are cardinal principles of the Republican party. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] has denied it. I have proven it by the platform declarations of that party. I have proven it by citing the language of leading Republicans, who have strongly advocated that system and still seek to maintain it. I have proven it by the utterances of a Republican President. Upon the one side there are all these evidences, these declarations of Republican principle; and on the other side is the naked declaration of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

I am willing that this issue between us shall be judged by the House, shall be judged by the country. The gentleman says that if the Republican party is in favor of "civil service reform," and if that is one of its cardinal principles, then that he is disloyal to the Republican party, and I notice with regret that this sentiment met with manifestations of approval on this side of the Chamber. In the light, Mr. Chairman, of the proof which I have submitted as to the position of the party on this question, and in the light of the gentleman's own statement, I here and now convict him of being disloyal to the cardinal principles of the Republican party. If he wants to stand on the Democratic platform he can do so.

Many honest Democrats and many honest Democratic papers are in favor of civil service reform, but that party as an organization has unfortunately fallen into bad hands. The same element which sometimes controls State and even national conventions may possibly have had something to do with putting the declaration on this subject into the Democratic platform without full authority to do so from the great Democratic masses they assumed to represent. Here is the declaration in the platform upon which William J. Bryan made his canvass against honest money, and his denunciation of lawfully constituted authorities, such as the Supreme Court, supported, as he was, by the various elements of discontent which he had collected together and sought to mold into symmetry for the purpose of lowering rather than maintaining the standard of legislative and financial honesty in the country:

> We are opposed to a life tenure in the public service. We favor appointments based upon merit, fixed terms of office.

A MEMBER (on the Republican side). That is right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman says "that is right." From a Democratic or anticivil-service standpoint, yes. Why, my friend, the very heart of civil service is its tenure of office.

Mr. PEARSON. Does the gentleman believe in a life tenure?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Wait a moment. The Democratic platform proposes that instead of having a raid on the offices of the country every three weeks or every six months, we are to have it only every two or perhaps only every four years; that instead of disorganizing the whole machinery of the Government in its various Departments by changes at short intervals, we shall graciously spare the great mass of American people the spectacle of a new horde of men thrust into offices as the mere personal appointees of the men who appoint them, irrespective of their qualifications except as this or that party may come into power under our frequent political mutations.

Mr. PEARSON. Does the gentleman from Indiana believe in life tenure in office?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I believe in life tenure in the civil service—yes, sir. [Applause.] So long as a man is honest and capable I would not disturb him in office. I believe that the people of this country own the offices in all the departments of the Government, and not the men who undertake to use them for selfish purposes or as bribes for their support in order to secure office. [Applause.] I believe that these positions belong to the American people and are in their hands for the purpose of promoting good and efficient government, for the purpose of securing proper administration of the Government, and for the general purposes of the public welfare, rather than for the encouragement of fraudulent elections. [Renewed applause.]

I believe that every man in this country, whatever may be his political affiliations, should be permitted to undergo a civil-service examination, and that when he is found qualified, and when there is a vacancy in the service and he has shown himself entitled to it under the law, he should receive an appointment. If he is found competent, if he has the requisite mental and moral qualifications, no matter what may be his political convictions, he should have an opportunity to enter the public service. [Applause.] I am unalterably opposed to making these offices bribes for the benefit of the spoilsmen.

I believe that the bright and ambitious schoolboy, the boy or man working in the shop or living on the farm, no matter what may be his party association and however destitute he may be of political influence, should have his chance to go before an honest commission and be examined as to his qualifications to fill any of the offices, and that he should have a chance to be appointed to the same, instead of farming them out to some man, or the son of some man, who may be able, by his political position, to work the machinery or control votes, and thereby be able to shape the destiny of some mediocre candidate for office, who does not dare to trust himself, upon his qualifications or his record, to the impartial and unpurchasable suffrages of his constituents, and who, in his eagerness to secure position, is not willing to trust his candidacy upon the high plane of some great public principle. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK].

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. Chairman, the debate on the question before the committee has drifted far and wide from the matter really under consideration, and has practically developed into a discussion and comparison of the Democratic and Republican platforms. So far as we are concerned on this side of the House, we wish to say that we are entirely satisfied with the full and eloquent defense of the Democratic platform made by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. I think that he and other distinguished gentlemen on that side of the House have fully vindicated and amply and ably defended that platform from the attacks made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

The real question before the committee is this question of pensions. I felt on yesterday, in listening to the discussion and to some of the speeches uttered on this floor, that it was entirely idle and futile for anyone to attempt a rational, temperate, and dispassionate discussion of that question. Whenever any person, no matter how mildly or temperately, especially on this side of the Chamber, undertakes to discuss and assumes to criticise our pension system, whether with reference to the law or the administration of the law, there is always some fiery patriot ready to jump up and denounce him as a "slanderer" of the old soldier; and that settles his hash for all time to come.

Mr. Chairman, whether the use of such expressions in the discussion of this question is really an outburst of honest and patriotic indignation, or whether they are intended to drag the debate down to the level of the controversial faculties of those who use such expressions, I shall not undertake to decide. It certainly is true that there never has been a debate in this House on the pension question, as far as the records show, in which reason and argument have not been utterly routed and overthrown by the factitious indignation of some bottle-scarred warrior who represents a pensioned constituency on this floor.

Now, so far as we of the South are concerned, we are interested in pension legislation, not as unregenerate rebels, nor as enemies to the men who wore the blue and fought the battles of the Union, but simply as taxpayers and as citizens of this great country.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] said on yesterday that the pension roll was a tribute to the prowess of the Confederate soldier. That may be, Mr. Chairman; but the trouble with the gentleman's statement is that we of the South have to pay that tribute. That tribute is levied upon us——

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CARMACK. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. I believe, leaving the States of Missouri and Kentucky out, the entire South pays in the shape of internal revenue about $16,000,000 and receives in pensions to Union soldiers living in those States the sum of $22,000,000.

Mr. GAINES. They receive only about 1.3 per cent of the total payments.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. Chairman, at the proper time I shall undertake to convince the gentleman from Indiana that his figures are wrong, and I shall show him, furthermore, that the internal revenue is not the only tax levied on the people of the southern part of this country, for I think I can convince the gentleman that the tariff is also a tax.

Mr. STEELE. Well, that is another question.

Mr. CARMACK. So far as the Southern people are concerned, they pay their proportion of all the taxes levied on the people of the country for pensions and they get but little in return.

The people of the North get back the money that is collected from them, and they get what we pay besides. Now, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not object to that, if it is done in moderation. I do not object to forcing the people of the South to pay their proportionate share of a just and honorable pension roll; but when the pension roll grows to be five times as large as it was when General Garfield apologized for it as excessive, then I think that even a Southern taxpayer has the right to expostulate with this horse-leech's daughter, and ask when the enormous expenditure is going to be stopped.

Mr. Chairman, as I have said, the Southern people do not object to pensioning the Union soldiers. They do not object to this Government being just and even generous in dealing with the soldiers; but I do believe, and I say it in all seriousness, without any feeling whatever, except a just and proper feeling, that the manner in which our pension system has been administered, and the extravagance of our pension laws, has done much to debauch the public conscience in this country. I believe that it is degrading to the old soldier when he is encouraged, like Falstaff, to make diseases a commodity and to set a commercial value upon his patriotism; when pension agents all over the country are going around stirring him up and encouraging him to put every ache and pain and trivial ailment upon the market, and require the Government to pay him for it.

If a man was disabled in the service of the Union, if he was rendered unable to obtain a living by proper efforts, and if he is dependent upon manual labor for his living, I believe that this Government should pension him, and pension him liberally; but I say, Mr. Chairman, that the trouble we are in to-day, the fact that this appropriation will not be able to meet the expenses of our pension roll, is due to the fact, in my judgment, that a great many men are upon the pension rolls who ought not to be there. I do not mean that they are unlawfully there, but I do mean that the law should be so amended that no man could be carried upon the pension roll who does not need the pension given to him by the Government.

Mr. ALLEN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday, in the course of my remarks, I stated that the South received through the Knoxville pension agency 4 per cent of the pensions paid. That was disputed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who stated that we received nearly "20 per cent." I am right, and he is wrong. My statement is corroborated by letter of this date from the honorable Commissioner of Pensions, which I hold in my hand. The Commissioner says, in addition to this, that the South received during the last fiscal year (1897) only "1.3 per cent of the total amount of the pensions disbursed." The letter of the honorable Commissioner of Pensions is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, December 10, 1897.

SIR: In response to your personal inquiry of this date, I have the honor to advise you that the amount disbursed for army pensions during the fiscal year 1890 was $103,689,813.15; the amount disbursed by the pension agent at Knoxville, Tenn., was $4,717,602.18, or 4.5 per cent of the total amount; and the amount disbursed by the pension agent at Louisville, Ky., was $3,524,862.98, or 3.4 per cent of the total amount disbursed for that year.

During the fiscal year 1897 the amount disbursed for army pensions by the United States agents was $136,170,193.66; the amount disbursed by the pension agent at Knoxville, Tenn., was $7,800,963.43, or 5 per cent of the total amount, and the amount disbursed by the pension agent at Louisville, Ky., was $4,238,196.72, or 3.1 per cent of the total amount disbursed for said purpose during said year.

During the fiscal year 1897 there was disbursed for pensions by the several pension agents in the following States, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia, a total of $18,101,616.28, which was 1.3 per cent of the total amount disbursed for army pensions during that fiscal year.

Very respectfully,

H. CLAY EVANS, Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN WESLEY GAINES,
House of Representatives.

A few weeks ago I read a letter, now possibly in the possession of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], from ex-Secretary Herbert, stating that of all of the appropriations of every kind made by the Government the South received about 4 per cent. It would seem from this high authority that the small pro rata received by the South of the appropriations made by the Government is not confined exclusively to pensions.

Our appropriations for pensions amounted to $2,344,101,732.37 from the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, inclusive. Now, at the same rate, 1.3 per cent at which pensions are now being paid in the South, as shown by the honorable Commissioner's letter, the South has received during this period $30,473,322.52, while the balance, $2,313,628,409.84, has been disbursed elsewhere. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] says that the reason why we receive such a small amount of the pension appropriation is because the South furnished very few Federal soldiers. It is the fact, regardless of the cause, and the effect of that fact—the unhappy conditions produced thereby—that is, the drain upon our already too small volume of money in the South, that I wish to recite and to call sharply to the attention of the House.

Let the explanation be as it may, another important fact remains, regardless of the explanation of the gentleman from Iowa, to wit, that nearly everything the Government now buys is purchased in the East; at all events, elsewhere than in the South. Now, why is this? Why should it be? Why should it continue? Does the Confederacy of thirty years ago enforce these conditions? These statements are based upon information that I have received from reliable sources, and if they are erroneous, I want some one to correct me.

Let us go a step further on this point. From June 30, 1866, to June 30, 1898, that is, for the same fiscal period, we have spent for the Navy $745,294,902.20. Now, is it not a fact, or practically so, that the Navy is equipped and maintained in the East? Is not all our armor plate, good, bad, and indifferent, purchased in the East—in Pennsylvania? Is not all of our powder used in the Navy purchased in the East, I believe in Delaware?

For the same period we have spent for the Army $1,445,853,698.50. Is not the Army practically equipped in the East? Our firearms, our guns, our powder, our projectiles, are purchased there.

For our Military Academy we have expended during the same period $11,870,839.93. Now, where is West Point? Is it not located in the East? Are not the immense expenditures connected with it, therefore, made there? And so it is with Annapolis; that is located practically in the East. And you must understand that these expenditures are annually made. They are continuous. Looking at these circumstances fairly, we must be impressed with the idea that all this money has been practically spent in the East. These four appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, to the year ending June 30, 1898, inclusive, tabulated, read thus:

Army	1,445,853,689.50
Navy	745,294,902.20
Military Academy	11,870,839.93

Mr. Chairman, with these immense amounts of money forced East by the power of law, not by economic conditions, if you please, a constant drain is produced upon all other sections except the East, where these expenditures are mostly made. It is against such laws and the continuation of such conditions of things that we protest. We may not be able to change the particular laws that enforce such conditions, but if we will in the future deal fairly with the South the effect of such laws can be counteracted, there can be a fair equalization. It is this that I want. It is this to which we feel we are entitled.

INTERNAL REVENUE PAID BY THE SOUTH.

Let me call the attention of the House to another proposition. It is that these same fourteen States paid in internal-revenue taxes, excluding the stealthy, incalculable tariff tax, $31,000,000, in round numbers in 1897, and received back in 1897, in pensions, the sum of $18,000,000, in round numbers, which makes a dead loss and constant drain annually to the South of $12,899,206.58.

The official figures upon which this statement is based, in tabulated form, read thus:

Internal-revenue tax paid by the South (1897)	$31,000,822.86
Pensions paid to the South (1897)	18,101,616.28
	12,899,206.58

INTERNAL TAX PAID BY NEW ENGLAND STATES.

The six New England States pay in internal-revenue taxes about one-sixth of this amount—that is, $5,488,098.32—but in return receive in pensions $13,285,575.30, and Heaven knows how much more in other appropriations. Tabulated, this calculation stands:

Internal-revenue tax paid by New England States	$5,488,098.32
Pensions paid to same States	13,285,557.30
Pensions received over tax paid	7,797,458.98

This is an unfair distribution of public expenditures. It should be, and can be, equalized in a large measure. Let there be reciprocity between the Government and the people in the South, as has been the case with the Government and the people in the East, in these expenditures. Though it may be an incident of the law, this inequality will then gradually but surely disappear.

As stated before, we do not object to being taxed to pay a just pension; but we do object to pensioners who are millionaires. Let the pension laws be stripped of millionaire pensioners, to the end that the pensions of those who have little or no outside income may be increased in amount, if proper. To do this means to carry out the spirit of a proper pension law without increasing taxation.

Mr. ALLEN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not going to undertake to make a speech, and will not tax you long to hear what I have to say; but I accept a situation which seems to me to be inevitable, which is, that we have an enormous pension debt to pay now, and which may continue for many years. I can see no end to it. I do not know when it is going to grow less. I think justice has been done, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] says, to the soldiers of the late war, but I do not believe that justice is done to the Mexican soldiers.

I feel that it is my duty to raise on this floor a question which I think ought to be considered, and upon which I have not heard a word. That is, that if this burden is to continue, as it seems certain, we ought to hear something about how it is going to be met; how the money is to be raised. As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] says, we are interested as taxpayers in the South. I say to you, gentlemen, while you are talking so eloquently in favor of the old soldiers, let us talk about the means to pay this debt, about how we are going to raise the money.

Is it going to be done on Dingley tariff bills? I must confess that I do not believe it is possible. I do not believe that under our present means of taxation it is possible to meet all the Government debts in the future and this increasing pension debt. I say to you, gentlemen, give to the people a just, reasonable, and fair income tax, out of which these pensions may be paid, and the burden of the consuming taxpayer, who pays by consumption, may be decreased without decreasing the means by which these pensions may be paid. If rich men are upon the pension rolls, let us take a little of their income to help pay the pensions of the poor in place of putting the burden of pensions entirely upon the taxpayer who pays as a consumer.

I mention this simply to call the attention of the country to the fact that such a law ought to be on the statute books to-day to permit an income-tax levy for that purpose, and if our Constitution is in the way of enabling us to put this burden where it belongs, I say let us amend the Constitution, and have a just and reasonable income-tax law, and then I will vote for every pension bill that you may offer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] who has just sat down invite some consideration of the receipts and expenditures of the Government for the next fiscal year, but before I enter upon that field I wish to call attention to the fact that the impression which was given here yesterday that our pension expenditures are increasing beyond what has been known in the past is entirely incorrect. The maximum expenditure for pensions was reached in the fiscal year 1893, when it was the sum of $159,000,000. For the fiscal year 1894 it was $141,000,000; for the fiscal year 1895 it was also $141,000,000; for the fiscal year 1896 it was $139,000,000, and for the last fiscal year, that of 1897, our pension expenditures again were $141,000,000.

The appropriation for pensions in the bill that is now pending is $140,000,000, or $141,000,000 including all the expenditures connected with the administration of the pension laws. It has been suggested that it is possible that the expenditures for the fiscal year 1899 may reach $148,000,000, although there is some doubt respecting that. But if it is thus increased, it will be not by any change of pension laws, but by the rapidity of the adjudication of pension cases, which in the end involves no additional expenditure. Therefore let it be borne in mind that the maximum expenditure for pensions was reached in the fiscal year 1893, that it has since declined, and even if it reaches the sum of $148,000,000 in the next fiscal year, it will be $11,000,000 less than the fiscal year 1893.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asks how we propose to pay the pension expenditures. We have proposed in the past, and we propose in the future, to pay them by internal taxes upon liquors and tobacco. The revenue from internal taxes for the next fiscal year is estimated by the Treasury Department at $165,000,000. So that if the expenditures for pensions for the next fiscal year shall reach $148,000,000, it is probable that the revenue from internal-revenue taxes will pay all pension expenditures and $17,000,000 more than the maximum that has been suggested for such expenditures.

But I did not intend to discuss this limited question of appropriations for pensions solely. We are entering, in the consideration of this bill, upon appropriations to carry on the Government for the fiscal year commencing the 1st day of July next and ending on the 30th day of June, 1899. What is the prospect as to expenditures? What is the prospect as to revenue? A practical question that we ought to face at this time.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates—and I think it is a conservative estimate, estimating on the basis of business as it exists to-day in this country, and not on the improved basis which we think will exist a year hence—that the revenue from customs, from internal revenue, and from miscellaneous sources (excluding receipts from Pacific railroads) for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, not including postal receipts, will be $390,000,000. If postal receipts are added, then the revenue for the next fiscal year is estimated at $482,500,000. But we may drop postal receipts and postal expenditures, so far as paid by postal revenue, because we are considering the question as to what our other expenditures to be paid by taxation will be, and what our revenue, outside of postal receipts, probably will be.

The estimates submitted in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] so well explained yesterday, have caused much misapprehension. In the estimate therein made—made, as he states, in accordance with the provisions of law—the total expenditures for the fiscal year 1899 are placed at $504,000,000, including postal expenses paid by postal receipts. Excluding these, the estimate is $411,500,000, to be paid by taxation.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] called attention yesterday to the fact that this estimate was not what the Secretary of the Treasury believed the expenditures for the next fiscal year would be, but that he made the figures in pursuance of the requirement of a provision inserted in the Senate in the river and harbor act which was passed by the last Congress. That provision reads as follows:

> And hereafter the Secretary of War shall annually submit estimates in detail for river and harbor improvements required for the ensuing fiscal year to the Secretary of the Treasury to be included in, and carried into the sum total of the Book of Estimates.

For the first time in the history of the country, the Secretary of the Treasury, as he construes the law, is required by this law to insert in his estimates the amount estimated by the army engineers which can be expended for river and harbor improvements for the next fiscal year. Under the operation of that new statute the Secretary of War sent to the Secretary of the Treasury an estimate of the expenditures for rivers and harbors for the next fiscal year made by the engineers, and the Secretary has explained in a note that he includes it by requirement of law, and in his report he has further stated that he does not believe that all this amount ought to be expended.

The result is that the estimate covers an expenditure of $411,500,000, of which there is $73,000,000 for public works, such as rivers and harbors, public buildings, and coast defenses. Does the Secretary of the Treasury believe that $73,000,000 ought to be expended for these purposes during the next fiscal year? No; he does not. Does the Secretary of War believe it? No. He states distinctly that he does not; and yet, in obedience to that new law, this amount appears in the estimate. What is the result? The apparent expenditures for the next fiscal year are lifted suddenly $45,000,000—and expenditures, too, without authority of law.

The expenditures of this Government paid by taxation in the last fiscal year were $365,000,000; yet in this estimate appears an estimated expenditure of $411,500,000, an increase of $46,500,000 in one single year, and nearly all of that for rivers and harbors. Obviously no officer of this Government, no responsible minister, no Congress that properly regards its responsibilities in the matter, would tolerate for a moment an increase of expenditures in one year, for public works alone, amounting to almost $50,000,000. No wonder that the Secretary of War says that this money ought not to be expended, but that he includes it in his estimate by direction of law! There is no authority of law for any such expenditure. It is in this way, Mr. Chairman, that the estimate is sent in of $411,500,000 as the expenditures of next year to be paid by taxation.

Now, of course, with such an estimate as that the Secretary of the Treasury is forced—forced by the statute passed by the last Congress—to declare that, with an estimated revenue of $390,000,000, there will be a deficit of twenty-one and a half millions. Of course there would be. If this Congress, if this Administration, if the President of the United States, if any official, any responsible person, proposes to lift the expenditures of this nation $50,000,000 in a single year and to put that money into public works, over and above the immense amounts that we have been expending in that way during the past few years, then, of course, there will be a deficiency.

No one has ever proposed any revenue legislation that would certainly yield sufficient revenue in the next fiscal year, unless there should be an unexampled revival of business within a few months, to meet an expenditure of $411,500,000 to be paid by taxation; and I may add—and I violate no confidence in so saying—that neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor the President nor any responsible person connected with the Government supposes for a moment that Congress will tolerate any such increase in expenditures which would create a deficit on the estimates of $21,500,000.

Now, what ought the expenditures for the next fiscal year to be? The expenditures last year, to be paid by taxation, were $365,000,000, for the previous year they were $352,000,000, and according to the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury the expenditures for the present fiscal year will be $373,000,000. Is it not a fair judgment that the expenditures for the next fiscal year ought not to exceed $380,000,000—seven millions more than the Secretary's estimate for the present fiscal year, fifteen millions more than the expenditures of last year, and twenty-eight millions more than the expenditures of two years ago?

It seems to me that that is a fair judgment respecting the matter. Now, if the expenditures for the next fiscal year shall not rise above $380,000,000, then, on the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, there will be a surplus of about $10,000,000. If the expenditures are to be increased nearly $50,000,000 suddenly, which no one believes possible, of course there would probably be a deficit next year. But I take it for granted that Congress, in its wisdom, will see that there is reasonable economy practiced in regard to all expenditures, and will not increase its appropriations beyond the amount that is required by increase of population, for it must be remembered that the expenditures for rivers and harbors and coast defenses have been enormously increased within two or three years.

Now, a single word with reference to our expenditures generally. Gentlemen will find on examining the Government expenditures for ten years past that they have proceeded substantially on the basis of five and one-eighth dollars per inhabitant. That is the average for the last ten years. Of that, $2 per inhabitant has gone to pay pensions. Fifty cents per inhabitant goes now to pay interest on the public debt, for we must bear in mind that the interest on the public debt has been raised $11,000,000 by the increase of the debt itself on account of the deficits during the last four years. These two items, pensions and interest on the public debt, make up almost half our expenditures.

Gentlemen may be surprised to learn that the expenditures for ordinary purposes of this country per inhabitant have increased but very little during the last forty years. In that time they have never been less than $2 per inhabitant and they have never been more than two and three-eighths dollars per inhabitant—I mean the expenditures for ordinary purposes, exclusive of public works. The following statistics from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury will be of interest:

c This includes $20,304,224.06 of "premiums on purchase of bonds."
d This includes $10,401,220.61 of "premiums on purchase of bonds."

You will observe, Mr. Chairman, that the controllable element of our expenditures is largely in the direction of public works, public buildings, river and harbor improvements, military headquarters, coast defenses, and the new Navy. These expenditures have been running up very rapidly in this country during the past few years. There is where the increase of expenditure has been. Why, sir, ten years ago an expenditure of $15,000,000 for public works was called a large one.

Last year the expenditures on public works exceeded $20,000,000, not including $13,000,000 for the new Navy, and during the present fiscal year they will probably reach nearly $30,000,000 outside of the new Navy. Now, the estimate in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury—put there simply because the law requires it to be put there, and not because the Secretary thinks the amount can be properly expended—increases the proposed expenditure on public works to $73,000,000 outside of the new Navy. I take it for granted that the House and the Senate and the President propose to make no such advance in expenditure as that.

If the expenditures shall be kept down to a reasonable limit, making only the same advances that have been made year by year in the past in proportion to population, then the revenue of the next fiscal year, if estimated correctly by the Secretary of the Treasury, will pay every expenditure and leave a surplus of $10,000,000 besides. [Applause.] But if we are going to increase our expenditures $50,000,000 at this juncture at one stride, which I take it for granted no one expects us to do, then a deficiency would be certain, because no revenue legislation has ever anticipated any such sudden rise of expenditure as that.

And I may say, with reference to the framing of the revenue bill which became a law a few months ago, that the estimate of the Committee on Ways and Means was that this Government required about $5½ per inhabitant in order to meet expenditures. The estimate all through was made on that basis. With the expenditures within that limit, there will be no difficulty in having the revenue sufficient to meet them the moment we shall have overcome the obstacles that have been put in our way by anticipatory importations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a single word with reference to the present fiscal year. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates a deficiency of $28,000,000 for the present fiscal year, and that entirely outside, it will be observed, of payments on account of the Pacific railroads. Everyone understands that when the revenue bill passed the House of Representatives in March last it was supposed the bill would either become a law within a very short time, or if it did not, that then the retrospective provision which was adopted by the House on motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] would be included in the law; that thus anticipatory importations would be prevented and the Government would realize all the revenue which the law was intended to provide.

But it was impossible either to secure a rapid passage of the law or to retain the retrospective clause which this House adopted; and in consequence of that, anticipatory importations set in with a force never before known, in order to avoid the new duties, and the time allowed was so ample that those anticipatory importations exceeded the utmost expectations of anyone. I have here a list of the leading articles imported between March 1 and July 24 in excess of what was imported during the corresponding period of the previous year, with the amount of revenue actually paid in and the amount that would have been paid in if those articles had been imported after the latter date and had paid the new duties. This table is in part as follows:

Increased importations of thirty-eight articles from March 1 to July 24, 1897, and losses of revenue from such anticipatory importations.

The above table includes only thirty-eight articles—largely free under the old tariff and dutiable under the new tariff—on which the Treasury received less than $19,000,000. But if they had been imported under the new tariff, as most of them would have been, as they were required for consumption this fiscal year, they would have paid to the Treasury nearly $62,000,000, thus involving a loss of revenue of nearly $43,000,000. Other anticipatory importations not included in the table carry up the loss of revenue to nearly $51,000,000.

As a result of a careful examination of those anticipatory importations, I find two things: First, that articles intended for consumption in this fiscal year, and which would not have been imported until this fiscal year if we had not been engaged in a revision of duties, paid duties under the old tariff from March 1 to July 1 to the extent of $38,000,000. That sum of $38,000,000 belongs in equity to the revenues of this fiscal year. Those duties were paid on goods consumed in this fiscal year, and which ordinarily would have been imported during this fiscal year.

In that way that amount of $38,000,000 went into the Treasury before the 1st day of July, with the result that it swelled apparently the receipts of the Treasury for the last fiscal year to the amount of $38,000,000 and made the deficit of the last year that much less than it would have been if we had not had in preparation a new tariff bill. In November a year ago Mr. Carlisle, the then Secretary of the Treasury, estimated the deficit for the last fiscal year as likely to be $65,000,000.

If there had been no tariff legislation in prospect, the deficit would have been $56,000,000 at least. It turned out to be only $18,000,000, because the $38,000,000 which properly belonged to this fiscal year and which should properly have been credited to the new law went into the Treasury to the credit of the last fiscal year. Hence, in any proper estimate of the revenue-producing qualities of the new law, that $38,000,000 should be added to what will be actually received from July 1, 1897, to July 1, 1898, saying nothing about the absolute loss of revenue from other anticipatory importations which came in between March 1 and July 24 free of duty or at less duty than they would have paid under the new law. The $38,000,000 was a mere transfer of revenue from this fiscal year to the last fiscal year, but the importation of the other goods was an absolute loss to the Treasury.

How much wool do you suppose was imported from the 1st day of March to the 24th day of July in excess of what was imported during the corresponding months of the previous year—an excess properly belonging to this fiscal year? Two hundred and nine million pounds—enough clothing wool to last from the 24th day of July last until nearly the 1st of July next. There was not so much carpet wool. Sixteen million dollars' worth of woolen goods were imported in those months in excess of what was imported during the corresponding months of the previous year.

Why, sir, on wool and woolens alone the Treasury lost $27,000,000 by these anticipatory importations. This is important as showing the revenue-producing qualities of the law with respect to wool and woolens when we shall have overcome the effect of these anticipatory importations.

Of Chinese mattings—a small article, apparently of little moment—how much do you suppose was imported in anticipation? Nearly a million dollars' worth, upon which the Government lost duties to the amount of $450,000.

Of rags 20,000,000 pounds were imported, on which the duty to this Government was absolutely lost. Sugar importations were 768,000,000 pounds; of course the duty on that was lost. Burlaps—think of it!—one single article, two and one-half million dollars of value imported, on which the Government lost revenue of $800,000. But, Mr. Chairman, I will not stop to read these items.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Maine pardon me for an interruption just there? I want to ask a question in order to understand precisely his argument. Is his conclusion based on the argument that the amount of revenue to which he refers would have been lost to the Government, assuming that the same amount of importations——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. I would like very much to have the time of the gentleman extended to answer this question.

Mr. DINGLEY. I should like to have a few moments longer, Mr. Chairman, by consent of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. DINGLEY. About ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, the balance of the time is under the control of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will yield time, in order that this question may be answered.

Mr. DINGLEY. If I can obtain a slight extension of time, I shall be under obligation.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield me ten minutes of the time now, and I will return it to him next week? [Laughter.]

Mr. FLEMING. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done in the House.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. In the absence of the gentleman from Mississippi, if the Chairman will permit me, I will assume to extend a part of his time to the gentleman from Maine, being satisfied that it will meet his concurrence.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Could not the time be extended by unanimous consent on both sides?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. We will come to that later on.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Maine will proceed in the time of the gentleman from Mississippi.

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman the question that I attempted to ask him a few moments ago.

Your estimates there are based upon the amount of revenue lost to the Government——

Mr. DINGLEY. Provided, of course, these articles were imported in this fiscal year.

Mr. COX. Yes; but they are based on the idea that the same amount of goods would be imported under the operations of your bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am simply saying that these anticipatory imports must be consumed—as they will be during this fiscal year—before the regular importations of such articles will come in under the law. And it will be observed that a large part of these articles would have been imported under ordinary circumstances during this fiscal year.

Mr. COX. Then, as I understand it, it is a mere matter of conjecture as to how much of these articles would come in under the new law?

Mr. DINGLEY. I am only speaking of the loss to the revenue by reason of these anticipatory importations. Of course every article which is imported in this manner anticipatory of the action of the new law at a lower rate of duty must be consumed before new importations are made, and thus temporarily defer the revenues which would arise from the bill under similar importations.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman from Maine will permit me, I understand him to say that this deficiency to which he refers is caused largely by anticipatory importations?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman when he thinks the normal condition will be reached in the Treasury, and the revenues will no longer suffer from this cause? We would like to have his idea as to when we will get the benefit of the law to which he refers.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will come to that presently.

The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chairman, after giving the estimates, showing twenty-one and a half millions of dollars of deficiency, on which I have commented, goes on to say:

It is confidently believed that when in full operation the new tariff will afford ample revenue for the ordinary needs of the Government.

Some suggestions have been made in the public prints of the country which may not be important to consider at this time, but to which I will call the attention of the committee, to the effect that Senator ALDRICH, a prominent member of the Committee on Finance in the Senate, has been silent on the matter of the probable revenues derived under the new law, coupled with an intimation that he believed that there will not be sufficient revenue for the next fiscal year to meet expenditures.

I hold in my hand a copy of a letter from Senator ALDRICH, which I will put in the RECORD. It is a letter written to the secretary of the Home Market Club and publicly read at a banquet given by that club in Boston. It is dated the 9th of November. Omitting the parts of the letter referring to other matters, the letter of Senator ALDRICH is as follows:

PROVIDENCE, R. I., November 9, 1897.

We can now see clearly in the increasing industrial activity and a much greater degree of activity in the future the wisdom of the policy adopted by the Administration of President McKinley securing the prompt enactment of protective legislation.

It is true we have had, as was expected, insufficient revenues and demoralized markets as a temporary result of the enormous importations made in anticipation of change. This will, however, soon be over, and in a few months we may confidently expect that our revenues will equal our expenditures, and domestic producers will once more have the benefit of the American market.

All that is needed is patience and a disposition to give the tariff of 1897 a fair trial.

* * * * * * *

Very truly, yours,

N. W. ALDRICH.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. In how many months, I should like to know?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will reach that point in due time. Now, the Secretary of the Treasury estimates that the revenue for this fiscal year will be $345,000,000 (not including Pacific railroad receipts), and expenditures $373,000,000, leaving a deficiency of $28,000,000; but if there should be added to the revenue, as equity demands, the $38,000,000 paid in before the 1st of July on articles imported for consumption this year, which would not have been imported until after July 1 if we had not been revising the tariff, then the revenue in this fiscal year would be $383,000,000, or $10,000,000 more than the expenditures; so that, without considering the loss resulting from other anticipatory importations, we see the amount turned over to the last fiscal year that properly belonged to this would alone make the revenue for this year more than equal to the expenditures.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] asks when we may expect that our monthly revenue will reach expenditures under the existing revenue laws. Of course estimates of revenue looking to the future are always problematical. No one can speak with certainty. We can only draw probable inferences. Now, we commenced in August, after the act was passed—the anticipatory importations having almost stopped importations for the time being—with a revenue of $19,000,000 only. In September the revenues increased to $22,000,000; in October, to $24,000,000; in November, always a lean revenue month and one day short, to $25,000,000. And allow me to say that although I did not expect that in December there would be an improvement of more than one million, because December is not a large importing month, yet I am informed by the Treasury Department that if the revenue keeps on for the remainder of this month as it has started in in the first nine days it will rise from $25,000,000 in November to at least $27,000,000 in December, with the probability of coming nearly, if not quite, up to the expenditures for the month of December.

Some anticipatory importations covered the consumption of two or three months, some four and others six months or more. It was thought that the anticipatory importations of clothing wools were sufficient for consumption for nearly a year, although there are a few wools now and then coming in. It was supposed that sugar had been imported in advance that would last until at least January. I understand that a very few cargoes of sugar have already come in, and that importations of that article may be expected to begin in January, and that by March there will be covered into the Treasury, in duties on sugars alone, nearly $5,000,000, which does not yet appear to any material extent in the receipts from customs duties.

Now, it is difficult to say just when the full effect of anticipatory importations will be overcome. This is certain, that it will all be overcome during this fiscal year, and there is agreement among importers and the Treasury authorities with respect to this matter. Some things have already begun to run out that were imported in advance, so that the revenue from imports and from those provisions in the new tariff increasing the internal tax on beer and cigarettes and from the new bottling law is increasing at the rate of from one to two million dollars per month, and this increase will continue until before this fiscal year expires there will be ample revenue to pay the monthly expenditures, according to the judgment of the Treasury authorities, whose figures are based upon the best available sources of information. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALLEN. I will yield to the gentleman further time, if he desires it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think I will not detain the House further.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman will allow me a minute, I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine if I understood him to say that by March it is predicted that we shall reach the full fruition of revenue under the Dingley tariff law—all that we can realize under it?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have said that it is very difficult to specify an exact time when goods that have been imported in anticipation will be completely consumed. I have said that it is the judgment of the Treasury officials that by March sugar imports will have been commenced in full proportions.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But still——

Mr. DINGLEY. I will say further that it is the impression of the Treasury authorities that in March the receipts will equal the expenditures, and if the importations for even this month keep on as they have been coming in during the first nine days of the month they will be enough this very month to meet expenditures, although I have not counted on that.

A MEMBER. Does the gentleman think that nine days would be a sufficient test?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not understand him to say that, but I do understand the gentleman to say that by March we shall be receiving, under the Dingley law, the full amount of revenue which it is capable of producing.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have said nothing of the kind. Do not put words into my mouth that I have not uttered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I am trying to get the gentleman to tell me what he said.

Mr. DINGLEY. I did not say anything of that kind.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am only anxious to get the opinion of a gentleman so well informed as the distinguished gentleman from Maine as to when we shall get the full amount we can hope to realize under the Dingley bill. Tell us that, if you please.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will repeat what I have already said, and I think it is all that I may be justified in saying, that before the close of this fiscal year, in May or in June, without any reasonable doubt, we will have sufficient receipts to meet every expenditure for those months. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. But still the question I asked is—and I hope the gentleman will answer that, and not impute want of sincerity to me—when, under the present tariff law which bears his honored name, we can hope to realize the fullest amount that we are going to secure under it.

Mr. DINGLEY. When we shall have overcome the effect of the anticipatory importations we will have revenue sufficient to meet the then current expenditures, and the revenue will thereafter increase with the revival of business.

Mr. RICHARDSON. When are we to expect we may overcome the effect of the anticipatory importations?

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman knows there is no one that can accurately determine how long it will be before all anticipatory importations are exhausted. It is sufficient for my purposes for the present to state, and I state this with the concurrence of the officials of the Department who have to deal with our Government finances, that before this fiscal year shall have expired there will be ample revenue to meet the monthly expenditures as they occur. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I only asked the gentleman that question because I wanted him to be as specific as possible. I hope he will be here in June, and I hope I shall be here, and I will ask him the question at that time.

Mr. DINGLEY. I may as well answer a question as to why we did not place in the revenue bill some temporary provision to provide revenue for this fiscal year until the effect of anticipatory importations was overcome.

The difficulties were many. If duties had been placed on any articles on the free list, very little revenue would have been secured if the duties had been temporary; and if the duties had been made permanent, the revenue would have been too large after the first year or two. I should have been pleased to double the internal tax on beer for one or two years, but it was found impracticable at the time; and the argument that whatever small deficiency might arise the first year because of anticipatory importations could be met with the excess of cash in the Treasury, provided there should be revenue sufficient thereafter, was finally accepted.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] undertook by his retrospective amendment to reduce the losses by anticipatory importations to a minimum, and the House agreed to it, but the Senate would not concur. Indeed, I believe that the other side of the House opposed it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And did not the Supreme Court decide that it could not be done?

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. The Supreme Court did not determine that; and even the board of appraisers, in deciding that the new tariff did not go into effect till the hour it was approved by the President, placed their decision on the ground that there was nothing in the law that showed it was the intention of Congress to make it retroactive.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to say, in closing, that neither any Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee or of the Senate Committee on Finance nor any official of the Treasury Department charged with the administration of the law has any doubt that if we bring the expenditures of this country within the limit of the past, simply increasing as the population increases, we shall have ample revenue for the next fiscal year, and that the revenue will go on increasing as the prosperity of the country shall increase and as it will increase. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine a question, if I have his permission. I wish to ask him if it is not true that the Treasury Department is now concealing a deficit by covering in as a miscellaneous item the money received from the sale of the Pacific railroad?

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all.

Mr. BAILEY. I venture to say that the books of the Treasury will show that every dollar that has been paid on the purchase of that railroad is credited as a miscellaneous receipt.

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course it is; it can not be credited anywhere else. Where else can it be credited?

Mr. BAILEY. This is put into the books of the Treasury as a receipt of the Government, and thus covers up a deficit.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is referred to by a note, and the amount is given; and all you have to do is to subtract the amount, and you find what the receipts from ordinary sources were.

Mr. BAILEY. They will receive $54,000,000 from the sale of the road. If that is covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt, and if there should be a deficit of $54,000,000, it would thus appear that there would be no deficiency at all.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. There is no other place to put it, except as a miscellaneous receipt. It is a miscellaneous receipt of the Government. In the statement that I have given I have excluded any statement as to the receipts from the sale of the Pacific railroad, and kept this entirely separate. The Secretary of the Treasury includes no Pacific railroad receipts in his estimate of three hundred and forty-five millions revenue for this fiscal year.

Mr. BAILEY. But surely the gentleman from Maine will not contend that either the tariff bill or the internal-revenue law are to be credited with the $54,000,000 received through the sale of the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. DINGLEY. The internal revenue law—why not?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, if the gentleman is willing to ask the House and country to believe that his bill sold the Union Pacific Railroad for $54,000,000, then it is all right. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Gentlemen may strike, but they had better hear first. I supposed the gentleman from Texas was talking about the internal revenue, and not about the Pacific railroad.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no.

Mr. DINGLEY. I so understood the gentleman. There is no Pacific railroad money in any of the figures that I have given.

Mr. BAILEY. But we are discussing the question whether there is going to be a deficit or not. The gentleman says that by next June the current receipts of the Government will be ample to meet the expenditures.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes; the current monthly receipts. The receipts of May will meet the expenditures of May, and the receipts of June will meet the expenditures of June; but the receipts will not be sufficient to overcome the deficit that has occurred during the first four or five months of the operation of the law.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the gentleman from Maine means to say that before the close of this fiscal year the taxes levied by the Government will be ample to meet the expenses incurred by the Government?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes; the monthly receipts.

Mr. LACEY. Let me ask the gentleman from Maine whether it would not be fair to at least include the difference between what the Pacific railroad has been sold for and what it was offered for in the last Administration? [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, that is a matter of argument.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the revenues of the Government are to be, at so early a period, sufficient to meet the current expenditures every month, what is the objection to using the surplus in the Treasury for the extinguishment of the public debt, thereby stopping interest?

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no greater surplus than we will need after meeting the obligations of this year and paying the Pacific railroad bonds, which become due next month.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, we will stop the interest incurred under a Democratic Administration quite early. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. In order to do it you will have to first stop your extravagance.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Illinois ought to admit that a Republican President says that the sale of bonds can not be avoided unless the greenbacks are retired, and yet the gentleman from Illinois and his party have not the courage to introduce and pass a bill to retire them.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think the President has not selected the gentleman from Texas to interpret what he has said.

Mr. BAILEY. I take it from his message.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the gentleman puts a construction upon the language of the message which the President would not accept.

Mr. BAILEY. The President says there are but two ways to meet the situation, by retiring the greenbacks or by selling bonds, but you are not willing to do either.

Mr. ALLEN. I yield five minutes to my colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that any scene so creditable to any people was ever before presented as that which met our gaze immediately after the close of the late war. The Confederate soldier addicted himself patiently to the arts of peace and went back without a whine of complaint to his plow, and the Federal soldier treated him generally with a magnanimity and generosity of spirit that have never been equaled in any country in the world where a civil war had taken place. [Applause.] At the same time, Mr. Chairman, it is well not to forget that, as a result of that war, you did levy a tribute. I am not going to say, as some of my friends on this side have said, that we gladly pay that tribute, but we do pay it, and we regard it as one of the results of the war between the States which have had to be met.

Now, my friend from Indiana, Governor STEELE, fell into a mistake a while ago which reminded me of what a man once said to me about an account that was presented to him. I asked, "Is the account correct?" He said, "It is all right except in two particulars; the debit side is not right, and the credit side is altogether wrong." [Laughter.] My friend from Indiana said that the South received $22,000,000 in pensions per annum and paid $16,000,000 to the support of this Government. The only objection to that statement is that he is wrong in both particulars, and he got wrong because he was misled by the old familiar fallacy which the logicians call the double-middle. Sometimes when you speak of "the South" you mean "the solid South," and sometimes you mean the eleven rebel States.

The gentleman from Indiana doubtless intended to convey the impression that those eleven States, or the old South, as you sometimes call them, stood in the attitude which he stated with respect to the receipt of pensions and payment of taxes. When I got the figures upon which he had based his statement—his figures, or rather those given him—I found that he calculated that there were 147,000 pensioners in the South, averaging pensions of $154 a year each, and in that way he made out his $22,000,000. But when I look at the items I find that 28,457 of these pensioners are, by his own figures, in the State of Kentucky, and fifty-three thousand eight hundred and some odd in the State of Missouri, not a part of the rebel States at all. Kentucky and even Tennessee furnished more soldiers to the Federal Army than any single New England State except Massachusetts—more than did even the State of Minnesota.

Now, I find that those two added together make 82,260 pensioners out of the total of 147,000—making in the neighborhood of 60 per cent of that $22,000,000. Then I find that all pensioners are included in this list; and nearly all of the pensioners down South are pensioners of the Mexican war.

So much for that side of the ledger. Now, the other side of the ledger is this: The gentleman seems to imagine that nobody pays internal-revenue taxes except the people who get licenses from the United States Government. Why, sir, the men who chew the tobacco, who smoke the cigars, who drink the whisky, who consume the other articles upon which internal-revenue taxes are laid are the men who pay the taxes. I am sorry to say that down South we do our share of the smoking and chewing and drinking, and thus contribute revenue to the Government; and we certainly, as consumers, pay our share of the tariff taxes.

One word more. I take it to be a fair statement that the eleven rebel States pay about one-third of the taxes which are paid for the support of the Government of the United States. That would make their share of the pensions $50,000,000; but take off $10,000,000 in order to be perfectly fair and to allow for civil pensions paid out there, and you reduce the amount to $40,000,000—and you have levied upon the old rebel population of the South each year a sum equal to 8 per cent of the amount of the gigantic war indemnity and tribute levied by Germany upon France at the expiration of the Franco-Prussian war, which was intended to cripple France forever. These are the figures. There is no escaping from these figures. Is it any wonder we are poor?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, the Speaker of this House, with that keen political foresight that has always characterized him, took me this year from the other important committees on which I had served and placed me on the Committee on Appropriations. I now understand why he did so. He saw that our Brother DINGLEY was going to be sweating under the collar to find how in the world to make the revenues meet the appropriations. He knew I was devoted to economical appropriations and thought that as a member of that committee I might be able to hold the appropriations down some until Brother DINGLEY could lift by his bill the revenues. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I repeat the statement I made on yesterday, and I have the itemized estimates before me to confirm what I say, that, taking the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury as to what the Dingley bill will produce in the next fiscal year and the Secretary's estimate of what should be appropriated to comply with existing law and pay the current expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year, leaves a deficit of $72,677,885.85.

Now, I insist that the estimates are not as high as the expenditures will go, and the estimate as to what the Dingley bill will produce is largely an overestimate, and that there will be a deficiency of more than $72,000,000, and I take the estimates for the pension bill as an example. No man who will look into the subject will believe that $150,000,000 will pay the pensions for next year.

As I showed on yesterday, from the hearings before our subcommittee, the Commissioner of Pensions says it will take about $150,000,000. He says it will take about $148,500,000 for this current year, and that the amount required for the next year will necessarily be larger than the amount for this year, because he shows in his report that he is, by improved methods of administration, adjudicating a greater number of cases, and that many of these cases carry larger amounts, as the applications have been on file for a longer time.

Notwithstanding this, he says that he and the Secretary of the Interior discussed the matter and agreed to ask for only $140,000,000, and that they would get the rest in a deficiency appropriation bill. Now, the point I wish to emphasize is that the estimates sent in here are not for the amounts they expect to spend, but that it is a piece of legerdemain and hiding out by which they hope to prevent the country from being shocked with the deficit in the revenues.

Chairman DINGLEY was busy all last session explaining how he was going to get revenue, and he has started out now explaining why he has not succeeded in getting it, and I think will be kept busy the balance of the session on this explanation. But the explanation can not be made by any such system of legerdemain.

The trouble with his revenue bill is not in its failure to impose high taxes, for everybody knows that the taxes are distressingly high, nor is the deficit to be accounted for in whole by anticipatory importations, of which the gentleman has spoken.

The real trouble is in the crippled condition of the country. It is in the failure of your financial schemes and your high tariff taxation to bring to the American people the prosperity you promised them. You must give them fair prices and stability of prices for their products before they can buy goods imported to this country on which revenues are paid.

Under present conditions, no reasonable estimate of the amount of revenue a tariff bill will produce can be made. For instance, as I remarked on yesterday, the low price of our great money crop, cotton—the depreciation in the price of that one item since the inauguration of President McKinley, will cut off the purchasing power of the cotton raisers more than $100,000,000 for this year, and when the grain growers cease to get the benefits of the famine in other countries, their capacity to purchase will go the same way.

As a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I will do what I can to keep down expenses, and in the straits in which the Republican party finds itself in the discrepancies between the governmental receipts and its expenditures I hope to get some help from the Republicans. But I want to warn you gentlemen now that if you go on contracting the currency as your President and Secretary of the Treasury suggest, by retiring the greenbacks or putting them where they can not be gotten out of the Treasury except for gold——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Bottling them up.

Mr. ALLEN (continuing). You are not going to have any "era of prosperity." [Applause.]

And, Mr. Chairman, the other great leader on the Republican side of the House, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON], when he found me on that committee, assigned me to duty as one of the subcommittee to make up this pension appropriation bill. In the discharge of that duty the Commissioner of Pensions came before us, and I will give him credit for making to us some wise suggestions that, if carried out, would remedy some great wrongs; and I differ with those gentlemen on the Democratic side who attempted to criticise him yesterday for his efforts to have passed what in his judgment is remedial legislation. This is not a partisan question, for whenever you find a man on this side of the House who has a large constituency of pensioners you will find the vox populi presses on his diaphragm just as it does upon that of a gentleman on the other side. [Laughter.]

I say the Commissioner of Pensions suggested that it would be in the interest of a proper administration of the pension laws to have certain things corrected in those laws. I hoped that these reforms might be attempted by somebody else; but as nothing was said about it, I made some remarks on the subject yesterday. I know what I said was good-tempered, and there was nothing in my remarks calculated to offend anyone, and I am proud to say quite a number of real battle-scarred veterans on the Republican side of the House have come to me since I made the speech and assured me they approved of what I had to say and of what I was trying to do.

But knowing the disposition of some people on that side of the House to try to make a little cheap capital out of anything an ex-Confederate might suggest on the subject of pensions (happily for the country that class is growing smaller all the time), I suggested that I hoped no battle-scarred sutler would rise on the floor and assail my intentions.

It seems, Mr. Chairman, that I did not raise the ire of the battle-scarred sutlers, but I did arouse a man who, I am sure, would have been one if he had been old enough. I refer to the gentleman from Michigan who replied to me yesterday. What a pity it is he was so young, for I am sure that if we Confederates had seen his manly form during the late war, consternation would have overcome us, especially if he had assailed us with the weapon with which he usually makes his attacks—the same with which Samson slew so many of the Philistines. [Laughter.]

I stated yesterday that this amendment I was advocating had been suggested by the Commissioner of Pensions, who had told us of certain abuses connected with the subject. I simply desire to read here the recommendations of the Commissioner of Pensions. It is in his report made to this Congress:

I do most earnestly recommend the passage of a law to the end that no pension be granted to the widow of any soldier that shall marry hereafter. As the laws are now, the woman that marries a soldier who is pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, can get no pension as a widow (unless she was married to the soldier prior to the passage of the act of June 27, 1890); the woman that marries a soldier who is pensioned under the general law and becomes a widow is entitled to a widow's pension.

There should be no discrimination, and a woman that marries a soldier now (thirty-two years since peace was declared) takes him for better or for worse. She was not the wife of the soldier during the war; she experienced none of the hardships, deprivations, and anxieties incident to the life of the wife of a soldier, and should not be placed on the roll as such.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Michigan was arraigning me for calling attention to abuses to which the Commissioner of Pensions had called our attention, and when I informed him that I had received my information from the Commissioner of Pensions, he said he took the responsibility of denying, on behalf of the Commissioner of Pensions, that he had made any such statement.

Now, it is not a great thing for a man to take the responsibility of denying a truth, especially when he has no reputation for truth himself. But when any man undertakes, where I am known as I am known here, to deny any statement made by me, he brings his own reputation under very serious suspicion. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan seemed rather to complain that none of the old soldiers had taken offense at what I had said. He said he was not a soldier of the war, but he thanked God he was able to resent the attack on the veteran soldiers in this high place. He reminds me of a story I once heard told in the other end of the Capitol under somewhat similar circumstances, and I think it will bear repeating as illustrating his case.

There was a fellow who went with a circus, and his part of the performance was to squeal like a pig; and the offer was always made to bet that he could squeal more like a pig than a pig could squeal like himself. [Laughter.]

So a man, not thinking it was possible for anyone to beat a pig squealing like a pig, took the bet. The judges were selected; the circus man and the pig were placed under a tent and the judges on the outside; the pig was made to squeal, and the man squealed, and the judges gave judgment against the pig. [Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman from Michigan is squealing for the old soldiers, and squealing more like the old soldiers, and everybody who has heard him must give judgment that he has squealed more for the old soldiers than the old soldiers have squealed for themselves on this subject of pensions. He said yesterday in his remarks that although he was too young to be a soldier himself, he beat an honored old soldier in his race for Congress. No wonder he feels called upon to squeal.

What sort of a constituency, in the name of Heaven, has the gentleman that in a Republican district, they would allow him to defeat an old soldier?

A MEMBER. He outsquealed the old soldier.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, this is no Confederate attack on the old soldier. I hold in my hand a letter written by the gallant veteran, Gen. H. V. Boynton, a man distinguished for his patriotic services in war and his prominent connection with all matters of interest to the veterans since the war. This is a letter written recently to the New York Sun. The letter reads:

THE PENSION OCTOPUS—SWALLOWS NEARLY ONE-HALF OF THE FEDERAL REVENUE—H. V. BOYNTON'S POINTED VIEWS—THE SUM OF $150,000,000 MAY BE REQUIRED IN 1893, OR $32,000,000 MORE THAN THE ESTIMATED RECEIPTS FROM CUSTOMS—MEN ON THE ROLL FOR WHOM A PENSION SHOULD BE A BADGE OF SHAME—THEY SHOULD BE SOUGHT OUT BY VETERANS AND EXPOSED.

[From the New York Sun.]

For the first time since the pension appropriations began to assume enormous proportions it seems certain that the subject will receive proper and earnest attention from Congress.

It begins to be seen that a pension list which thirty-two years after the close of the war closely approximates half the total number of three-year enlistments, and which is still rapidly growing, demands serious consideration. It is a case where the assistance is needed of the veterans who sprang to arms in 1861, before pensions or bounties were talked of or thought of. Their aid is a patriotic duty now as then. They owe it to themselves to frown upon unworthy pensioners on the rolls and unworthy applicants.

The pension roll now far exceeds the membership of all the patriotic societies of veterans which the war created; in fact, is considerably more than double the membership of all of them—Grand Army of the Republic, Union Veteran Legion, Union Veterans' Union, Military Order of the Loyal Legion, Society of the Army of the Potomac, Society of the Army of the James, Society of the Army of the Tennessee, Society of the Army of West Virginia, and the Society of the Army of the Cumberland.

Turning from the contemplation of numbers to the consideration of the cost, it appears that next year's expenditure for pensions will require more than half the yearly receipts as calculated upon those of the month just closed. The present estimate is that the roll will cost $150,000,000. To put the matter in still more striking form, this annual outlay will require $32,000,000 more than the total receipts from customs, estimated upon those of the month of November last as an average. If this annual expense be compared with the internal-revenue receipts estimated on the same basis, it is found that the entire revenue from this source, with the exception of $12,000,000, will be required to pay the pension roll.

Looked at in another shape, if a line could be formed equal in length to one made up of all the three-year veterans of the war and every other man should be advanced a pace to the front, the numbers in either line would then but slightly exceed those on the pension roll, and more than every other dollar of the Government revenue would be required to pay it.

More startling still does the magnitude of this pension payment appear when its amount is compared with the items of annual appropriations. These, in round numbers, were the appropriations for the current fiscal year:

Legislative	$7,713,000
Executive proper	200,000
State	2,169,000
Treasury	32,269,000
War	59,978,000
Navy	33,554,000
Post-Office	939,000
Interior, except pensions	15,012,000
Agriculture	3,188,000
Justice	6,126,000
Labor	174,000
Pensions	141,294,000
Total	302,585,000
Total without pensions	161,321,000
Pensions for next year	150,000,000

It will be seen from these figures that if the cost of Congress, the Printing Office, the Library, and the Botanic Garden, expressed in the item legislative, and the Agricultural Department be taken out of the above column the pension for next year will equal the total cost of the remaining Government service—that is to say, the cost of pensions will, with the small exceptions noted, equal the entire salary list of the Government in Washington and throughout the country, the expenses of all the Departments, including the whole judicial system, the cost of the Army and Navy, Post-Office deficiencies, public buildings, fortifications, and ships, rivers, and harbors, the Department of Labor, and the whole expense of the White House and its salaries.

A long array of prominent items, such as those for the Coast Survey, the Life-Saving Service, the light-house system, the Indian service, the General Land Office, the Marine-Hospital Service, the National Soldiers' Homes, the Customs service, which are included in the above figures, might be added to still further emphasize the point under consideration.

Such comparisons as these have at last attracted the attention which they deserve, and Washington upon the eve of the opening of Congress is full of talk based upon such presentation of the subject.

Pension reform has been a question which for years has been forcing itself upon the attention of Congressmen. It has been put aside from year to year because, from motives which are easily understood, and which have much to commend them, there was a general disposition to provide for the growing burden rather than seem even to be turning the cold shoulder to veterans. But with a pension expenditure requiring more than half the present yearly revenues, and at a time when these revenues are falling many millions below the total annual expenditures, the question becomes one involving not only justice to the old soldier, but fairness to the rest of the nation.

There is no dissent worth consideration from the proposition that if $150,000,000 is fairly due to soldiers or those who have been or are dependent upon them on account of disabilities incurred in the service, every cent of it should be promptly paid. Further than this there is general assent to the proposition that the Government owes to all who were disabled and impoverished by the casualties of the service not the mere pittance which so many of these now receive, but a sum which, with other means that the pensioner may be able to command, would lift him and those depending upon him above want.

There is a growing feeling that the pensions enjoyed by many thousands who are in full health and comfortably fixed in life should be terminated, and the Government be thus enabled to more nearly discharge its duty toward the helpless and the miserable.

If the pension lists could be printed, every community in the land would be disgusted with its revelations. Wealthy men in large numbers would be found upon it. Thousands would be revealed whose disabilities were only temporary and so long since disappeared. A small army of men would be discovered to whom their pensions are in no sense a necessity. While this state of facts would appear, it should not be forgotten that there are men in good circumstances and many in public positions of honor and emolument whose disabilities and persistent wounds are of a character for which no pension which the law provides can even approximately compensate.

At every step they have found themselves handicapped in the battle of life. For such, and indeed for all of every rank and position, through the various grades of disabilities, a pension is not only due as fully proportioned to the needs and deserts of the case as the Government can afford, but it is also a badge of honor. To those who are not thus incapacitated for full effort in the struggle of life, and who do not need it because of the comfortable life which they can command without it, a pension should be a badge of shame. These sentiments are rapidly gaining ground among men whose friendship for the soldier never has been and never can be successfully disputed.

First and most numerous among those who rise to denounce such views are the pension claim agents. Of course there are honorable and honest men among them. But as a class they have robbed and rifled and plucked the soldiers to an extent which entitles them to all the honors of freebooters. By their persistent pursuit of veterans and their heirs, and their alluring representations, which have generally been misrepresentations, these agents have undoubtedly been responsible for half the pension roll. They have profited to the extent of many millions by fees, which in the main have been exorbitant. During the past year, as the figures in the Pension Office will show, they have collected much more than half a million dollars from the pensioners, not counting the minor fees and expenses charged to them, which bring the attorneys' charges to the pensioners of the year well up toward the million mark.

Veterans should know that there is no necessity whatever for employing claim agents. Blanks can be had at the Pension Office covering all cases, and pension agents and the special agents of the office in the field will give every information. The body of clerks here are experts, and every case receives full and intelligent examination, and each claimant receives detailed information of the proof required, and all without cost to the applicant. All this applies to worthy cases. When a case is unworthy, or where a veteran does not know that he is disabled, of course the services of pension attorneys, who make a specialty of such cases, is imperative.

The huge dimensions of the pension roll are largely due to the fact that the Government let the preparation of cases go out of the hands of its own force into those of attorneys. It is one of the most marked cases of the shepherd abandoning the flock to wolves which the history of any nation affords. It is not too late to save veterans who have not yet been devoured. When the annual payments of all kinds to this class amounts to a million dollars a year Congress can do a kind act to veterans, their widows and orphans, by providing that no fees shall be paid upon any claims for pensions filed hereafter.

The experience of Congressmen who show the least disposition to restrict pension legislation uniformly discloses the fact that the army of pension attorneys at once proceed to raise a clamor. Their talk, their letters, and their circulars glow with the loftiest sentiments of mock patriotism. In their essence these declarations are to the effect that veterans, having saved the country, have a moral right to loot it. Before the apparent storms which these performers raise many good resolutions touching pension reforms vanish. But the time seems to have arrived when the pension situation will command the attention which it deserves, because restrictive measures are both just and necessary.

It is in the interest of every deserving pensioner and every self-respecting veteran that unworthy pensioners should be exposed and the success of undeserving applicants should be prevented. The situation strongly appeals to the members of all patriotic societies for help. If the spirit of 1861 still lives, it should not be difficult to create a sentiment among veterans that unworthy pensioners can not be held to be in good and regular standing.

The feeling among Congressmen is that, in the nature of the case, any proposition for pension reform should emanate from the Republican side, and, more important still, from some prominent Union veteran, if one of sufficient courage can be found to lead.

It is regarded as probable by those whose judgment in this matter should be good that unless revisionary or restrictive measures, or both, be soon adopted, the pension list for next year will reach $150,000,000, and that in three years it will be $170,000,000.

H. V. BOYNTON.

General Boynton's patriotism or devotion to the men with whom he fought can not be questioned. In this letter he simply states facts that must challenge the attention and receive the approval of all thoughtful and patriotic men.

I also desire to call attention to a speech made in the Senate yesterday by Senator GALLINGER, chairman of the Senate Committee on Pensions. Those of us who served with him in this House know that the old soldiers had no better friend than he. I quote one or two extracts from his speech, which was made about the time I was speaking over here:

On this pension question I share with other members of this body a great deal of concern. I am a friend to the soldier, and my policy has been one of extreme liberality so far as pension legislation is concerned. But I am satisfied that in this matter of private pension legislation we have gone to the extreme limit, and that we ought to call a halt.

I want to put myself on record also as being in favor of the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions; that we should speedily enact a law that no pension shall be paid to the widow of a soldier who shall be married subsequent to the passage of the act; of course, excepting those who may enter the military service in the meantime. In other words, that as to the old soldiers who are now permitting themselves to be married to young girls, we should put a stop to the granting of widows' pensions under those conditions. It is a remarkable and alarming fact that we have on the pension rolls to-day a few names of the widows of the Revolutionary war and a good many names of the widows of the war of 1812.

I simply quote from such men as General Boynton and Senator GALLINGER to show that men who have been closely identified with the Federal soldiers think it is time to call a halt as do many others, whose names I will not stop to mention, who have spoken to me here on the floor and said in substance the same thing—that the pension business had been largely overdone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a moment or two longer.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I hope the gentleman will have two or three minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN. But, Mr. Chairman, in closing this debate, I wish to say that when my friend from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, took the floor to-day I was in hopes he was going to relieve me from this duty which I now feel called upon to perform. Mr. Chairman, whatever may have been our feelings on the Cuban question heretofore, however we may have felt toward Spain and the Sagasta Government, it is all over with us now, and it must be down with Spain and freedom for Cuba. I am in a hot rebellion against Spain. [Laughter.]

Why, let me show you something that I read from yesterday morning's Washington Post. It seems that Señor Sagasta, premier of the Spanish cabinet, in an interview regarding President McKinley's message to the United States Congress, is reported as saying that he thought—

The message satisfactory, because the threat to interfere in Cuba was made merely to give satisfaction to a portion of the American people without any intention of executing it.

[Laughter.]

Now, just think of it, that over in Spain they have that sort of an impression of our President. Is it not enough to make one's blood boil to think that in Spain the premier actually accuses our President of saying things he does not really mean, to be trying to deceive some people here at home in order to satisfy them. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Why, when they sent out that Bimetallic Monetary Commission last spring, some of these real bimetallists in this country said something of that kind, about its being done to give satisfaction to some people without any intention to do anything. But we can put up with a little "sassiness" from our own people. Some of them, you know, went so far as to say they did not believe that the President expected or intended to do anything by his commission; but here you see that this impression about our President is reaching other countries, and I say that we should do something to stop it. We should declare war on Sagasta's Government as a resolution of confidence in our own President. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired, by order of the House. The Clerk will report the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, before we begin the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule, I want to state that there is one gentleman on this side of the House who desires to address the House, and I promised to give him some time, but he was crowded out. I ask unanimous consent that he be given ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that after the first paragraph of the bill has been read the gentleman can take the floor, and it will be in the province of the committee then to extend his time under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will that be satisfactory to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY]?

Mr. LINNEY. It will.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, namely:

For army and navy pensions, as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, dependent relatives, army nurses, and all other pensioners who are now borne on the rolls, or who may hereafter be placed thereon, under the provisions of any and all acts of Congress, $140,000,000: Provided, That the appropriation aforesaid for navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the navy pension fund, so far as the same may be sufficient for that purpose: Provided further, That the amount paid to each of the several classes of pensioners shall be accounted for separately.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] and myself are probably the only private Confederate soldiers upon this floor, and, so far as I know, the only ones who have ever been members of this body who were wounded in the late unpleasantness between the North and the South. Therefore we have very little interest in pension matters individually. All the pensions that we ever expect, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, we have received in the shape of powder and lead, and therefore we have no individual interest in the matter.

There is, however, one view of the case that I wish to consider. What is the purpose of pensions? As I understand, a pension is a sum of money given because of services rendered by the soldier; and the pension roll itself becoming a roll of honor, a double motive or incentive to good conduct is thereby afforded every brave soldier of any army—one in the way of the amount received, the other by reason of the honor conferred through his name appearing upon the pension roll.

But, Mr. Chairman, the pensions received and the privilege of appearing upon the pension roll belong only to the victors. The vanquished, so far as I know, in all past ages have never had the honor of receiving pensions, nor have they had the mark of distinction given them by having their names appear upon the pension roll—a roll of honor. There is, therefore, it seems to me, a striking analogy between the motives that operate in fashioning a spur to quicken the diligence of the citizen along the line of patriotic endeavor, in the matter of pensions going to soldiers who engaged in actual strife, and the motives that actuate men engaging in a great warfare of thought.

Every four years, Mr. Chairman, we have a war of thought, a war of opinion. The war of bayonets is used to defend the nation's life against violence; the war of opinion is necessary to perpetuate the principles that give it life. If, then, the victors in that strife which results in bloodshed are the only ones entitled to pensions, the only ones entitled to share in the honor of having their names upon the roll, then in every civil contest, in every war of opinion, only the victors, in my opinion, should participate in what some gentlemen are pleased to denominate spoils. [Applause.] The distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] is not interested in this view of the case as strongly as I am. Why? Because he is a Samson, head, foot, and all, in Mississippi, and I am not in North Carolina.

Let me show you. In the great State of Mississippi the Democratic party is so thoroughly organized, by the efforts of such grand men as my distinguished friend who sits here, that it only takes 7,321 votes to elect a Congressman, with only 335 votes on the other side. [Laughter.] In the State of North Carolina the Republican party has not the benefit of the genius of such men as my friend, and therefore it took 19,000 votes to elect me, with 18,000 on the other side.

The gentleman can rely much on party organization. I must rely upon the purifying process of reasoning addressed to the intellect and conscience. [Laughter.] And let me tell you that if this system of civil service continues, I will not get 19,000 votes next year. Neither will the Republican party in my State present force enough to grease a gimlet to bore a hole to bury ourselves. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. That is an encouraging prospect.

Mr. LINNEY. The gentleman says it is an encouraging prospect. It is a prospect, let me say to my friend, that he will never derive the benefit of, because our side of the House have wisdom enough not to walk into such a trap as that. We are going to repeal these civil-service laws, root and branch. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LINNEY. I ask an extension of time.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LINNEY. I thank the gentlemen of the House for the extension of time. Some of our Republican brethren, especially the courageous, dashing, splendid gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], I believe, seems to fear. [Laughter.] He seems to be in constant dread of the force of the enemy. His idea is that if we declare in favor of the repeal of this system of civil service that the Democrats will get the advantage of us. Why, my friend, you have not read the declarations of the platform or you would not have said that. They are the strongest defenders of civil service when they are in; they extend, and take all the benefits that the victors are entitled to in the war of thought.

Honest reform in the civil service has been inaugurated and maintained by President Cleveland, and he has brought the public service to the highest standard of efficiency, not only by rule and precept, but by the example of his own untiring and unselfish administration of public affairs.

[Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Does the gentleman tell me that that appears in the Democratic platform?

Mr LINNEY. That is in the Democratic platform of 1888.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. What year was that?

Mr. LINNEY. Why, in 1888, I have told you, my friend. [Laughter.] If you take the back track of the Democratic party you will not have gone but a few paces until you find ardent advocates of civil service reform, of Grover Cleveland, the sole worshiped hero representing that idea. Now they come here, Mr. Chairman, and actually criticise us with great severity on the idea that we are the friends of civil-service law, and therefore bound by it, and that our platforms are uniformly for it. I deny that they can do any such thing, upon plainest principles of reason and law. My Lord Coke says, "Estoppel against an estoppel doth put the matter at large," does he not? [Laughter.]

The Democratic party's record is in favor of civil service reform. Senator Pendleton, a Democrat, made it, and he made an argument in the Senate by which he attempted to sustain the constitutionality of it. So did Mr. Bayard make an argument in the Senate by which he attempted to sustain the constitutionality of it. True, distinguished Republican Senators did the same thing, but they all made the most flimsy arguments that I ever heard of great men making in their efforts to establish its constitutionality. Here I stand by the eternal verities of the Constitution, the Magna Charta of American liberty. It tells us what citizens are eligible and what citizens are not eligible.

That instrument in that debate in the Senate stood as a lion in the way. The Constitution, Mr. Chairman, only makes one life-tenure place—the judiciary; and it is actually conceded upon this floor that this civil-service law and its operation is to establish life-time offices. I am surprised at such a proposition being announced in a high place like this, a proposition that will not receive the sanction of a hundred intelligent men in the district from which the distinguished gentleman from Indiana is a member. [Laughter.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, the argument given in 1883 in favor of civil-service law, the main one, was, "We want to paralyze the arm of party despotism." They did not call it the "spoils system." It has been left partly to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana to infuse a little poison into it and use the more offensive terms of "spoils system" and "spoilsmen." "The arm of party despotism!" There is no such arm as party despotism. There is no associated political action, no machinery by which public influence and public opinion can be enforced except through "party organization," which the advocates of civil service in 1883 called "the arm of party despotism."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will be allowed ten minutes further.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I will yield ten minutes further to the gentleman.

Mr. LINNEY. Twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for twenty minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LINNEY. I thank gentlemen for their indulgence. The importance of the subject requires twenty hours instead of twenty minutes, so far as that is concerned. But, gentlemen of the House, it was urged in the Senate in 1883, in support of the bill of Senator Pendleton, if gentlemen will take pains to go back and investigate, "that the arm of party despotism should be paralyzed." That was one argument.

Now, I undertake to say that the only way in the world that you can smother out tyrants and destroy despotism is by thorough party organization. Wherever public opinion is permitted to manifest its force there is no despotism, but when you establish a life tenure of office, then you see the first outcroppings of despotism. Let me prove it. In the appointment of our first Civil Service Commission we got, I suppose, the best men that could be found in the Republic, but, as Thomas Jefferson said, we have no angels in our midst to guide us; we have no men who have been inspired from on high to mark out from the 70,000,000 people in the United States those who are eligible and those who are not eligible to public office, and, I repeat, the very moment you confer a life-tenure office upon the citizen you start him in the line of despotism.

Let me see if I can demonstrate this to a moral certainty. It has been illustrated already to some extent by our present Civil Service Commission. Mr. Procter—General Procter, I believe—is at the head of that commission. He is a great man and, I take it, a pure man, and the whole commission is made up of good and pure men. But now let me illustrate what I have been saying by reading extracts from the proceedings before the Senate Committee on the Civil Service.

At page 253 the following is found:

Captain PRATT. I present them here to show that they were not. That is my purpose in coming before this committee.

Mr. PROCTER. In a communication of Commissioner Browning to the Secretary of the Interior he says——

The CHAIRMAN. It is the judgment of the committee that you had better omit that, Mr. Procter, and let Mr. Browning come before the committee and make the statement he may have to make in reply to any statement that Captain Pratt has made. You can ask Captain Pratt any questions that you desire, but without quoting letters.

At page 274 is the following:

Mr. PROCTER. May I ask a question right there that I think will explain the matter more fully?

The CHAIRMAN. I suggest that Mr. Hallmann first conclude his statement, and then you can ask him any questions you desire.

Mr. PROCTER. It was on that point; I do not think he made the statement clear. He spoke of those disappearing from the list, and whether in disappearing from the list many of these people——

The CHAIRMAN. I suggest you had better let him make his statement and then cross-examine him.

There is one case where Mr. Procter could not have stood any sort of examination as a legal cross-examiner. [Laughter.] Here is another.

At page 376 is the following:

Mr. PROCTER. Was not Senator Manderson the chairman of the Committee on Printing in the Senate during the last Administration?

Mr. OYSTER. He was chairman of that committee for some time.

Mr. PROCTER. I will ask you if you know anything of a letter written March 3, 1893, to a prominent printer in New York who advocated the application of the civil-service rules to the Government Printing Office, in which Mr. Manderson uses the following language——

The CHAIRMAN. I suggest that it would be incompetent to give it in that way. You can produce the letter.

Mr. PROCTER. I will simply ask Mr. Oyster if he knows anything about such a letter having been written.

Mr. OYSTER. No, sir; I have no knowledge of such a letter.

Mr. PROCTER. Is it not admissible for me to assume that this is what Mr. Manderson wrote?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; the way for you to proceed is to introduce the letter. If the original is lost, you can introduce a copy; and if it is entirely gone, you can account for the loss of the letter; that is, if an official letter, sent by one official to another.

Mr. PROCTER. I wish to get this letter in the testimony, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. When you come to testify you can probably suggest some way to bring it in. You can not get it in by this method.

Mr. OYSTER. I do not know that I answered fully the question that was asked me in regard to the standing of the typographical union or the labor organizations on this question.

Mr. PROCTER. No; you did not.

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, these gentlemen hold a life tenure of office, because "during the pleasure of the President" means a life tenure. These men, when they come to be "examined," fall as far below the standard as do many of the applicants before them for positions. Where, then, are the angels to be found to designate eligibles. [Laughter.] There is another instance in this investigation before the Senate committee where the cross-examiner insisted upon his right to prove the contents of a written paper, although he did not allege that the paper was lost. That illustrates the disposition displayed by some of the men that we have selected for these life places. Now, what is the explanation of that?

The fact is, the gentleman knew better, but he felt that he had a life tenure of office and that made him a tyrant. Many of the performances of this good man before that committee have the earmarks of the despot. Confer this life tenure of office upon the hundred thousand people now in the various Departments and what do you do? You constitute a force of men who have no noble impulses or influences to quicken their diligence to do what is right.

But let me call attention to another point. I say, Mr. Chairman, there is no way of maintaining a party organization except by giving your friends the offices. [Laughter and applause.] The late distinguished Judge Pearson, of my State, the father of my colleague, once administered this rebuke to Judge Armfield, one of the best representatives of legal thought in our State: Judge Armfield had selected a witness from the camp of the enemy, and that witness had deceived him, and he asked for a new hearing upon the ground that the witness had deceived and betrayed him. The court declined to grant a new hearing, and Judge Pearson said: "The man who goes to the camp of the enemy for a recruit and catches a traitor is not entitled to the respect or sympathy of this court."

That was the opinion of Judge Pearson. Now, we have, I believe, nearly 100,000 public offices in this country in the possession of men who fought on the other side in this great war of opinion, and the proposition contended for by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] reverses the ordinary course of warfare, whether it be a war of opinion or a war of arms, and undertakes to pension and honor the vanquished. Why, sir, four years hence, if we continue this course, we shall not have a party big enough to cast a shadow. [Laughter.] Let me illustrate this point further. Here [holding up an illustrated paper] is a picture of the Tammany tiger.

Tammany has never been celebrated for its righteousness, I believe, or for the righteousness of its members, with the exception of my friend Mr. AMOS CUMMINGS [laughter], and yet Tammany is omnipotent, Tammany is invincible, in the face of all the influences that its enemies can bring to bear. Why is this so? It is because Tammany respects her friends. Tammany pensions her friends and not her enemies. [Laughter and applause.] Look at this picture of the big tiger at the top, and all around you see the little tigers, applicants for the offices. [Laughter.] What sort of a picture would it be if there was one big tiger in the middle and all the smaller figures were monkeys and mice? [Laughter.]

Yet that is the kind of organization which the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] would have in the next campaign. The idea is revolting. [Laughter.] It is really itself a monster of monstrosity, and as far as I am able to conceive, it is positively degrading. [Laughter.] Another point. Take the Departments here; they belong to the people of the United States. If you confer a life tenure of office upon the employees of the Departments, you at once dig an impassable gulf between the people and their servants in office. I am told that in old times when a member of Congress visited a Department the clerks were running over one another to wait upon him; but you know how it is now, and if this thing goes on, five years from this time a Department clerk will not speak to a Congressman. [Laughter.]

I risk the assertion that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, if this thing continues ten years, will be walking into some Department of this Government with a pass from the head of the Civil Service Commission to get an opportunity to speak to one of those clerks. There is being built up an impassable gulf between these two classes of citizens.

Mr. Chairman, no sensible man, it seems to me, can have any respect for the man who is not in favor of his friends. General Grant was one of the grandest characters that this country ever produced, not only as a citizen but upon the field of battle. When my brother ALLEN and myself were engaged on the other side in the late unpleasantness (and I believe he admitted the other day that possibly it was the wrong side) Grant was great there, when he spoke kindly to the vanquished and said to us, "Take your horses home with you; you will need them to bring on your spring crops." [Applause.] A grand and glorious thought of that great man! He was no less great when he conferred upon that superb representative of courage in the South, General Longstreet, a mark of honor by appointing him to an office. But the crowning glory of Grant's greatness was that he stuck to his friends. [Applause.] What would Grant say about this civil-service humbuggery? Why, sir, he would feel like organizing a new army to suppress it, if he could not do it otherwise.

Plutarch puts into the mouth of Theseus the philosophic interrogatory, "What bird is clean that preys on fellow-bird?" So, too, we read that Hercules, the representative of strength, rejoiced at one time because a vulture came into his camp. Some one asked, "Why rejoicest thou?" Hercules replied, "This bird hath one virtue; though it lives on carrion, its beak hath never pierced the bodies of its own species." We ought at least to have the gratitude of the vulture. We ought to keep our beaks out of the bodies of our friends. In the distribution of what patronage we may have, that patronage ought to be given to the faithful. "Put none but the faithful on guard," it has been said. Well, sir, suppose we had such honest and great men in all our Departments as my friend ALLEN, from Mississippi, what would become of us? We had better call upon the rocks and mountains to hide us from his wrath.

But, sir, this system is wrong in another point of view. I believe that every man who is elevated to office, from the President down to the constabulary, has a sort of double property in the office. First, he has a property in the office itself; next, as an incident to that, he derives social excellence, and that social excellence inures to his benefit and to the benefit of his wife and his children. Nobody will deny that.

When the Republican Administration allows the vanquished in this war of opinion to become the beneficiaries of Government patronage it operates as a great injury to the wives and children of the Republican heroes who won the victory. The wives and daughters of the Republican heroes in this war of thought have a right to demand that they be not deprived of the social excellence which is withheld from them by placing the vanquished on this civil roll of honor instead of their husbands, the victors. There has never been but one case in history where it was considered heroic to assail a woman's social excellence or offer her violence. Theseus, the hero, slew Phæa; but her cruelty and profligacy were such a blight on the youth of his people that she was called the Crommyonian sow.

Now, here is a great party organization. If led by such men as my distinguished friend from Indiana it will be doing what? It will be giving social excellence and power to its enemies. It will not only recruit its officers from the ranks of the enemy, but will impart to them social excellence. Is that right? No sensible man will say that it is.

What sort of a pension list are we going to have after a while if this thing goes on? Let a civil service commission or any similar body designate 100,000 men exclusively eligible to office; let it place upon them the wedding garment, singling them out of 70,000,000 of our people; or, instead of 100,000, the number of this eligible class may be swelled to half a million. What is to become of them? They can not become lawyers, because that is the work of a lifetime. They can not become preachers for the same reason. They can not engage in great financial enterprises for similar reasons.

They must stand as a vast army of able-bodied beggars waiting for official appointment. They have been designated as the persons eligible to official life. They stand there smiting their breasts and thanking God that they are not like the rest of the American citizens. They stand there waiting their time. The result will be that you will have organized an immense company of able-bodied beggars, who ultimately will be demanding what? Demanding to be placed upon the pension roll.

What is this system going to lead to? Why, sir, the other day I saw down in one of the counties of North Carolina a man who had been sent from the city of New York to take charge of one of our distilleries. He had been sent down there among our people, perhaps, by Tammany—probably AMOS CUMMINGS had sent him down there. [Laughter.] The people did not like this proceeding. They thought they had intelligence enough to run a little 40-gallon distillery; they had been doing it all their lives. This was a man who, though coming from New York, had not long since come from Ireland.

What did the people do? Why, sir, the mane of that man's horse was trimmed. Who did it? I believe the Republicans did it. Why do I say that? Because, if Democrats had done anything, they would have cut the man's throat. [Laughter.] Suppose, sir, you should take some of our people and put them as officeholders in the great State of New York. What would you do, my learned friend from Indiana, if such a thing should be done in your State? Why, sir, good and glorious as you are, you would join a body of men to lynch that man at night. And yet that will be and is a part of the operation of this very civil-service system which was enacted, glorified, and carried into effect, and maintained at high-water mark, according to the platform of the Democratic party, by the President of that party, Mr. Grover Cleveland, during his Administration of this Government.

So, Mr. Chairman, I do hope that some step will be taken to stop this abuse. Let it be asserted that the men who engage in this warfare are entitled to as much respect and to the same opportunities for participation in the affairs of the Government as all of our people were before the law went into effect; and let it be asserted that one man is just as meritorious as another before the law, and that all have an equal right. [Applause.]

But some people say that they have that right already. Is that a fact? I deny it, sir. There is no equal chance given to men. Why, even some of the very best men in this House to-day could not stand the civil-service examination if they were called upon to do it.

Are any of you able to stand it? [Laughter.] Captain Pratt, in charge of one of the departments (at Carlisle), says he could not stand it, and he is a faithful and efficient officer of this Government. Are there any of the officers of the Government who could stand it? Could President Lincoln himself have stood it? I do not know. Why, Mr. Chairman, with all due and proper respect to our honored President, I ask could he stand such an examination as the civil service department requires of the employees of the minor departments of this Government? I do not know. Could the distinguished gentleman who clamors for this legislation, and who advocates it before this body stand it himself? I do not know. What is required?

Spelling is one of the requirements, and a man would have to spell properly, according to the books, before he could be admitted. Suppose that test was applied generally. Judge Armfield, one of the very best and ablest lawyers in my State, spells God with a "j," and a little "j" at that. [Laughter and applause.] Yet he is the leader of the best legal thought in that great State, and this day the equal of any living American.

Why, sir, if I had a stone in my hand to hurl over this body of intelligent men, and it was understood by some sort of mysterious influence that that stone was to be directed unerringly against the head of the man who could not stand the civil-service examination, and I hurled it with the force of a Hercules, there would be the most terrible dodging in this House that the world ever saw. [Great laughter and applause.] Probably not a dozen men in this body could stand the examination.

Now, I put this point to you and I ask you to consider it: The men who have been honored by the votes of their fellow-citizens, who constitute the body of this House and dominate it, should see that their supporters rather than their political enemies should participate in the honors and emoluments of Government service. They are below us only in official rank. So that if this House and its membership were blotted out of existence by a cyclone, does any man on this floor pretend to doubt that it could be duplicated without the slightest trouble from the citizens of any State in this great Union?

Mr. MAHANY. And improved.

Mr. LINNEY (continuing). And improved, as my friend on my left says. I do not know about that. [Laughter.] But it could be duplicated—such is the wonderful commonwealth that we have in this land—and the tallest and the greatest of them, those who stand before the country, just as the mighty oak carries its head above the small bushy blackjack, all of them would find their duplicates in this great land of ours. [Applause.] And yet if you apply that test to the people of this country, you would find it difficult to fill the House of Representatives, although you selected from among the ablest people in the land. And if you will allow me to use the expression of the same great judge again to whom I have already alluded, that system is a system of "special reading," and produces case-hunter lawyers rather than being well grounded in the elementary principles "of the law."

He uses the expression "manuring in the hill," because, as he says, the lawyer who uses his time to hunt up cases is a "case hunter" and simply succeeds by "manuring in the hill." This special education to prepare a pupil to stand General Procter's examination will never make a strong, broad man intellectually.

So, Mr. Chairman, I repeat that the system, as a system, is one that the sooner we modify it the better it will be for us and the country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LINNEY. I would like to have just a minute longer.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I hope there will be no objection to allowing the gentleman to proceed for another minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. LINNEY. The system, this judge says, operates injuriously in the legal profession, and he was a judge who knew what he was talking about. It is a system that operates to the detriment of the high calling of the grandest of the professions on the earth. Now, if it operates to the detriment and degradation of the legal profession, tell me, some of you friends of that system—of Mr. Grover Cleveland's party, for he was the high exponent—tell me how is it that the same system will not degrade the public service of this country. [Applause.] And you may take the evidence before the committee of the Senate, and you will find almost in every part of it that the ablest men and most thoughtful men, the men of experience who have examined and considered the question in its fullest details, declare that the application of that civil-service system to the Departments of the Government has not tended to elevate the service. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate be now closed on this paragraph.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to offer an amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would not cut off amendment, but only debate.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I give notice of an amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not undertake to say what amendment would be in order at this time, but refers now only to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The gentleman moves that debate be now closed on this paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I now offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 2, the word "forty," and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty;" so as to read "one hundred and fifty millions of dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon this paragraph is closed by order of the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask unanimous consent to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order. As many as are in favor of the amendment——

Mr. McRAE. When was debate closed, so as to prevent the discussion of amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment ago.

Mr. CAMPBELL. A point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Just a few minutes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Five minutes?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; not to exceed five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask unanimous consent that five minutes be allowed each side in which to debate this particular amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that five minutes' debate on each side be allowed on this amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I hope this amendment will be adopted. It increases the appropriation bill from $140,000,000 to $150,000,000, and the Commissioner of Pensions, before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, stated that it would take from $148,000,000 to $150,000,000 to meet the amount of pensions that would be issued during the year covered by this appropriation. Last year, if you remember, we had a deficiency of $2,000,000. This year it is estimated by the Commissioner of Pensions that there will be a deficiency of $6,000,000. It is estimated that for the next year, covered by this bill, there will be a deficit of from eight million to ten million dollars. For fear that what I have said will be misunderstood, I will read from the report.

The CHAIRMAN. Now we can begin on the question of the amount. The first item we see is for the general appropriation for army and navy pensions. The estimate for 1899 is $140,000,000, and the appropriation for the last three years has been $140,000,000, and you estimate the same amount this year?

Mr. EVANS. Well, my estimate is $148,337,000. If it runs as it does now it will come near $150,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. How does that come about?

Mr. EVANS. The Secretary of the Interior thought we had better make the same estimate. But I have got the figures here on which I base my estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you going to take the position we ought to appropriate $148,000,000, or are you satisfied to let us appropriate the amount named by the Secretary?

Mr. EVANS. Well, you are going to have a deficiency this year, and you know that just as well as I do. We had a deficiency last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question right at the outstart is, What attitude will we be placed in with a bill which proposes more than the Secretary of the Interior estimates?

Mr. BELDEN. I am in favor of asking the clerk to ask the Secretary of the Interior if he made that estimate on what he knows to be the basis, and if he has cut it down.

Mr. EVANS. I will frankly tell you so. Now, we were short $2,500,000——

Mr. BELDEN. That only makes it worse if we keep hiding it.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us take it up first and consider it on that point. I would like for Mr. Courts, who has had long experience as clerk of this committee, to say what attitude we will be placed in in the two branches with a bill which carries more than the estimates of the Secretary of the Interior?

The CLERK. It is not usual for the committee to report an amount in excess of the estimate submitted to Congress, unless the head of the Department advises by a supplemental estimate that a larger sum is needed.

The CHAIRMAN. Could that be done?

Mr. EVANS. We discussed this thoroughly, the Secretary and myself, and we concluded that we had better just put in the amount of last year. You will have to put in the urgent deficiency bill this year, assuredly—I bridged over last year; you were in special session for a special purpose, and, if you remember, you probably saw in the papers that I withheld the certificates for the month of June—did not send the certificates out. I preferred to treat it that way than to send the certificates to the pension agency and have them call for the money and not get it; so I held everything up until the 1st of July, and then sent them to the agency; but there was a deficiency of $2,467,000, practically a deficiency, if the pensions had all been sent out last year.

Mr. ALLEN. Do you merge these in that way—go on from one bill to another?

Mr. EVANS. In other words, they were not in the hands of the pension agents, and there was no deficiency created; but I withheld them so there would not be a deficiency, and I withheld $2,467,000. Now I am doing more work, Mr. Chairman, than was done last year in the way of auditing claims, and I will say I do not want this to be considered as a criticism, but my men tell me, and I expect that it is true, that during last year, in order to save creating a large deficiency, while there were a great many claims audited, they were small claims—current pensions. Now I am getting on these old claims, which carry considerable arrears with them, and I will say to you frankly in my estimates here I am just telling you the facts, and you gentlemen and the Secretary understand it, that there will be a deficiency this year which you will have to meet in your second session.

Mr. BELDEN. In other words, we are hiding our heads and helping to cover up this thing as much as we can, and we are not telling the truth?

Mr. EVANS. Well, I present the figures there on which I base my estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true; but what are we going to do?

Mr. EVANS. The Secretary and myself discussed that question, and he thought we had better estimate for the same amount and let it be covered in a deficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. If we go in with a bill greater than this, the committee will have the criticism of every fellow on the floor; and I doubt whether we could get it through the committee.

Mr. BELDEN. Or take the responsibility of hiding it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is only one of several hides.

Mr. EVANS. I estimate, aside from the $2,500,000 which was the real deficiency of last year, a deficiency of $5,500,000 or $6,000,000 this year, making, in round numbers, $8,500,000 deficiency.

Now, gentlemen, is it not our duty as honest men, is it not our duty to the soldiers who are drawing pensions or who are expected to draw pensions, to appropriate a sufficient amount of money to pay those people promptly and prevent them from having to go to the merchants of their cities and towns and be carried by them, in order that a deficiency may be covered up?

There is another matter to which I desire to call the attention of this committee, and that is this: Last year every member of Congress who was working the Pension Office closely, as I was for my constituents, will remember that he had a great deal of difficulty in securing the allowance of large claims that were justly due, the evidence all being complete. The Commissioner of Pensions gives the reason by saying, "But my men tell me, and I expect that it is true, that during last year, in order to save creating a large deficiency, while there were a great many claims audited, they were small claims, current pensions."

In other words, the clerks in the Pension Department are placed upon small claims that will not create a large deficit, and the old soldiers, the men who did the fighting in the front, who have old claims pending in the Department, could not get their claims considered. Their claims were carried over to this year, and I assume that will be the case next year. I desire to say in this connection that the Pension Commissioner states that there are 200,000 old claims yet that have not been passed upon. He estimates it will take a year and a half to pass upon 100,000 of those claims, and if that is the case, all those claims being old claims, it will take a larger amount of money to pay them than the claims that have been filed for increases. For that reason, if no other, this amendment should be adopted, these claims considered promptly, and pensions granted to the old veterans that are entitled to them under the existing laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] is recognized.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior both agree that $140,000,000 is a reasonable, proper amount to appropriate. We must remember that this appropriation is for the fiscal year beginning June 30, 1898, and as to the excess that will be required over and above $140,000,000, it is merely speculative. I do not see how we can be justified in appropriating any more than the amount recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior. Therefore I hope that this amendment will be voted down.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MAXWELL] proposes an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting "$165,000,000" in place of "$150,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MAXWELL. Will you allow me two minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed by order of the committee.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken on the amendment; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 133.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fees and expenses of examining surgeons for services rendered within the fiscal year 1899, $700,000. And each member of each examining board shall, as now authorized by law, receive the sum of $2 for the examination of each applicant whenever five or a less number shall be examined on any one day, and $1 for the examination of each additional applicant on such day: Provided, That if twenty or more applicants appear on one day, no fewer than twenty shall, if practicable, be examined on said day, and that if fewer examinations be then made, twenty or more having appeared, then there shall be paid for the first examinations made on the next examination day the fee of $1 only until twenty examinations shall have been made: Provided further, That no fee shall be paid to any member of an examining board unless personally present and assisting in the examination of applicant: Provided, That the report of such examining surgeons shall specifically state the rating which in their judgment the applicant is entitled to.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to offer an amendment at another place, but I will offer it now at the end of this paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the paragraph insert:

"Provided further, That any soldier of the war of 1861 to 1865 now on the pension rolls, or who may hereafter be placed on the pension rolls, who did not engage in any battle nor incur any disability while in the service, and who served less than three years, shall receive not more than three-fourths the pension rate fixed by law for a soldier of like disability who fought in battles and served throughout the entire war; and any such soldier who served less than two years shall receive not more than two-thirds the pension rate fixed by law for a soldier of like disability who fought in battles and served throughout the entire war; and any such soldier who served less than one year shall receive not more than one-half the pension rate fixed by law for a soldier of like disability who fought in battles and served throughout the entire war.

"Provided further, That the amount thus deducted from the pensions of those soldiers who only served for a part of the period during which the war existed, and who did not fight in any battle or incur any disability during the war, shall be added to the pensions of soldiers who did fight in battle and did serve in the Army or Navy from the beginning to the close of the war."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I understood the gentleman would allow us to offer amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, I want to call attention——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Will not the Chair hear me one moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman upon the point of order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I regret very much that the gentleman in charge of this bill is determined to prevent the House from voting upon this amendment. Under Rule XXI, as worded by Republicans, I admit the amendment is not strictly in order and that it was not in order the way it was reported yesterday, but as first prepared and reported by me it was strictly in order under Rule XXI, as it has always been framed by Democrats. It was my hope, from the attitude taken on yesterday by the gentleman in charge of the bill, that he would refrain from making a point of order upon so meritorious an amendment as the one which has just been read.

The purpose of the amendment is to make a distinction in favor of soldiers who fought in battle and who served their country from the beginning to the close of the war over those who did not engage in any battle and who were dilatory in entering the service or left it while the war still existed and their comrades were still standing in line of battle. The distinction made between these two classes of soldiers, so far as money rewards are concerned, is not great, but the country would soon learn that the one was a pension roll of honor and carried with it a distinction to which such soldiers are entitled. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that this House can not afford to shirk voting upon such an amendment by asking the Chairman that it is not in order. There is not a brave soldier nor the friend of a brave soldier in this country who does not approve of the principle embodied in this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of eighteen agents for the payment of pensions, at $4,000 each, $72,000.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I desire merely to make an inquiry of the gentleman who has the bill in charge. I call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to this proposition. There is in the first section of the bill a provision where the sum of $140,000,000 is appropriated.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is for only one purpose.

Mr. COX. That is what I want to get at. Now, then, after that amount is paid, then follow certain other appropriations, which wind up with the sum of $141,218,830. Now the point. It is stated in the bill that that includes deficiencies. Now, what is that deficiency that is included?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There is none.

Mr. COX. Why, then, did you include that in the bill? What is the deficiency included that goes to make up the amount, $141,218,830?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I have not a copy of the bill before me.

Mr. COX. Here is a copy of the bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman will permit me, I would state to the gentleman from Tennessee that the deficiency is anticipated and not a real one. There is over $8,000,000 of anticipated deficiencies.

Mr. COX. I understand that.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. What does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. COX. It is on the last page, under a star, "including deficiencies."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That refers to deficiencies prior to 1893; that is explanatory only. As I understand the gentleman, the amount put down there is the amount appropriated, including the original appropriation and the deficiency also. But what is the gentleman's question?

Mr. COX. Here is the question. Your $141,218,830 is made up by the first item of the bill, $140,000,000. Then there are the additional amounts stated in the bill, which make the $141,000,000. Now, I see no item for a deficiency in the bill. I do not understand what it is.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not understand the question. We can not tell whether there will be a deficiency or not until the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the point I make is this: This bill says one hundred and forty-one million and some odd thousand dollars, including deficiencies.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It does not say anything of the kind. The gentleman refers to the explanatory note, does he not?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, that is explanatory of the amount expended during the year 1893.

Mr. COX. So there is a deficiency included in '93.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Oh, yes.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided further, That any soldier of the war of 1861 to 1865, or other person now on the pension rolls, or who may hereafter be placed on the pension rolls, who is now, or may hereafter be, in the service of the United States Government in a civil capacity, whether by election, appointment, or otherwise, where such person receives by virtue of such employment, office, or position a salary, income, or fees equal to or exceeding in value the sum of $100 per month, shall not during his or her incumbency of such civil position, office, or employment receive or draw any pension under this act or any other law or laws now in force, and that all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with these provisos are hereby repealed.

Provided further, That where a pension to any such person or soldier has heretofore been granted or may hereafter be granted it shall only be abated and withheld for and during such civil employment as hereinbefore set forth, and such soldier or person shall be restored to the free enjoyment of such pension as soon as such civil employment shall be at end.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that proposes to change existing law.

Mr. BALL. I hope the gentleman will withhold that point for a moment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I can not do that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For stationery and other necessary expenses, $30,000.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Chairman, the object of the amendment which I sent to the desk is one that I think ought to be favored by every member of this House without regard to his political affiliations. Briefly, that amendment was intended to provide that those persons who are now in the civil employment of the Government and receiving compensation therefor as high as $100 per month or more shall not be permitted, during the time of such civil employment, to enjoy pensions from the United States Government for military service in addition to a salary much larger than that of the average taxpayer. The amendment certainly ought to meet the approval of the gentleman from Maine, the author of the tariff law under which we are now living, because, while doing justice to the soldier, it would at least help to keep the expenditures within the revenues of the Government.

The distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] said on yesterday:

Pensions are not granted as a reward for service, but their purpose is to equalize as nearly as possible the earning capacity of the men who are injured in the military service and those who are not. The Government says to a man about to enlist, "If, having taken your place in the ranks, you should suffer such disability as partially or wholly to incapacitate you for earning a livelihood, we will by a pension make good that loss." That is the theory upon which pensions are allowed.

I accept that as a correct statement of the reason why pensions are given. Now, it is a known fact that our laws provide that in competition for civil-service positions preference shall be given to Union veterans. We all know, too, that in seeking political preferment success is often achieved in many States by reason of honorable military services. Therefore, when we put such a soldier upon an equality with the man who is not disabled, by giving him an office, elective or appointive, which an able-bodied man is willing to fill for less money, why should we not withhold his pension during the time of such civil employment? Certainly there is nothing unfair in that.

It is a just provision, which ought to commend itself to every fair-minded man. I am aware of the fact that we of the South can not expect to gain anything by captious assaults upon the pension system. We can only hope to assist gentlemen who are honestly in favor of pension reform by bringing to bear such fair arguments and influence as will commend themselves as altogether just, and help to show a way out of the dilemma which embarrasses the Government in its efforts to collect revenue enough to meet expenditures.

If this amendment should become a law, it will only withhold pensions from men who are in the enjoyment of incomes of more than $100 per month from some civil employment, and only during the continuance of such employment. I am informed that there are members of Congress on this floor who, in addition to the salaries they receive as such, are drawing pensions; that Federal judges, in addition to their lucrative salaries, are drawing pensions.

While I do not criticise them for taking what the law gives them, yet I do believe they ought to be sufficiently patriotic, when they have been elevated to distinguished positions (perhaps on account of their war records), to forego during their term of service the amounts which they would be entitled to receive as pensions. There are many Union soldiers who have been given civil employment on account of their war records in preference to those not so fortunate, or unfortunate, if you please, as to have seen service during the late unpleasantness. This is true both as to elective and appointive offices, and of this we make no complaint.

We might justly save a large amount annually and, where proper to do so, increase the pensions of those not receiving compensation from Government positions by withholding pensions from the men who have been preferred politically and who receive incomes of more than $100 per month from the Government. The limit suggested is a far greater sum than the average pay of toiling millions who earn their living by the exercise of unimpaired mental and physical exertions. It does not seek to touch the pensioner enjoying a position with only modest demands upon the Treasury. It will reach only those who draw large salaries from the Government in addition to pensions. When the civil employment ceases, the pension will be restored. As to the propriety of this amendment there can be no doubt.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

From and after the passage of this act no widow of a soldier or sailor shall be allowed a pension unless the application for the same has been filed or shall be filed in the Pension Bureau during her widowhood: Provided, That in granting pension to widows and minor children the date of commencement shall be in all cases the date of the filing of the application in the Pension Bureau, this proviso to apply to all claims now on file or that hereafter may be filed: And provided further, That no pension shall be granted to any minor child or children unless the application for same was filed or may hereafter be filed during the pensionable minority of said minor or children: And provided further, That no pension to a widow of a soldier or sailor shall be granted or paid to said widow unless it is shown that the marriage of said widow to the soldier or sailor occurred prior to the passage of this act: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to the claims of insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless children; and all acts, or parts of acts, inconsistent with these provisos are hereby repealed.

Mr. ALLEN. I recognize that the proposition I have just offered——

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve a point of order on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be reserved.

Mr. ALLEN. I know that the proposition is subject to a point of order; but I thought I would ask unanimous consent to have it incorporated in the bill. I do not wish to speak upon it. It is substantially the recommendation made by the Commissioner of Pensions, and I had hoped it might receive the unanimous assent of this committee. Of course, if the point of order is insisted upon, the amendment must be ruled out.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, it is true that the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi includes in a crude and inartificial form some important matters suggested by the Commissioner of Pensions. But the language employed and the substance matter embodied in the proposed amendment do not fully and correctly present the views of the Commissioner of Pensions or of the Pension Department; that is, it is not in the form in which it is desired to have the legislation proposed go upon the statute books. It is suggestive rather, and is in the nature of memorandh for the use of committees having the subject in charge.

Mr. ALLEN. The gentleman will permit me to say that the Commissioner of Pensions had the proposition drawn up and brought over here. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Notwithstanding the assertion of the gentleman from Mississippi, I will state that he is somewhat in error in what he states. The gentleman knows full well that what he has here presented to this House as his proposed amendment was borrowed from me yesterday; he has copied verbatim et literatim the language of the proposition I handed to him.

Mr. ALLEN. That is true.

Mr. RAY of New York. And that paper I now hold in my hand is but one of many handed to me by the Commissioner of Pensions, and which purports to be simply a memorandum of subjects upon which he desires this House to legislate during this Congress. It is not complete in any respect; it does not purport to be accurate or complete in any respect, but is simply a note——

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the gentleman will permit me to make this statement: When the Commissioner of Pensions brought this matter to our attention—and I know that there is not going to be any question of veracity between the gentleman from New York and myself——

Mr. RAY of New York. I am sure not.

Mr. ALLEN. When the Commissioner submitted these propositions, I suggested to him in the committee that he have the law officer of his Department draw up what he thought would cover his view. In accordance with that request, two or three propositions were brought to the committee room and turned over to the gentleman from New York, some of them as the production of the law officer of the Pension Bureau, and some emanating from some other law officer of the Interior Department. That is why I made my statement.

Mr. RAY of New York. I have no doubt of the honesty and integrity of the gentleman from Mississippi. I have known him too long to think that he would attempt to deceive the country or the House in any way whatever. But the point I desire to press, in answer to the gentleman's suggestion that the amendment proposed by him is just what the Commissioner wants, is this: These papers were turned over to me by the Commissioner, with the statement that they were mere suggestions, in a crude form, of points of legislation that he desired to have covered. This matter and all these points will, I think, be brought to the attention of the House in an appropriate bill, which will be reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions after the subject shall have been thoroughly investigated.

I want now, if I may be permitted, to point out one serious defect in the proposition of the gentleman as he now presents it. It would shut out from pensionable status hereafter the widow of every soldier and sailor who may marry hereafter, but it would permit every woman who may hereafter marry a person who at some time has served in the Marine Corps to draw a pension in case she becomes a widow. I could point out other cases in which widows not of soldiers or sailors would be permitted to draw pensions, making a wide and unjust discrimination between the widows of different classes of men who have served in the Army, Navy, or some branch of the public service.

The case suggested illustrates the impropriety of hasty and ill-considered legislation upon any important subject, and especially upon such a subject as that covered by the pension laws of this country. We are aware—I am personally aware—that there are some defects in the law as it now stands; that in some instances it permits and compels injustice to the old soldiers and sailors who served their country. It is the desire of every patriotic citizen that these abuses shall be corrected; that justice shall be done to all. I must therefore, without taking further time, insist on the point of order that this amendment proposes new legislation, and object to its being attached to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I believe we have now concluded the consideration of the bill, and I move that the committee rise and report the bill back with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. DE ARMOND. If the gentleman will withhold that motion for the present, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I will withdraw the motion with the understanding that I shall be recognized to renew it after the gentleman's amendment is disposed of.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at end of the bill the following:

"Hereafter no person shall be permitted to draw a pension under the dependent-pension act of June 27, 1890, during or for the time when he shall have such fortune or be in receipt of such income from other sources, independent of his own manual labor, as shall be sufficient for his support and the support of his family, if any; and the Secretary of the Interior shall, by suitable regulations, enforce this provision."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I make the point of order that this amendment changes the existing law and is therefore out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I now renew my motion that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the pension appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back without amendment and with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PELAGIC SEALING.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion to enable me to ask unanimous consent of the House to take up and pass a bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means unanimously, prohibiting the killing of fur seals in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean. I refer to the bill H. R. No. 4353.

I will state that the Clerk holds in his hand, with the papers that I have sent to the desk, letters of the Secretary of State and Secretary of the Treasury, urging the prompt action of the House in order to correct our present legislation in view of certain diplomatic action now going on between this and foreign governments.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I will withdraw the motion temporarily.

Mr. HITT. Then I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill prohibiting the killing of fur seals in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no citizen of the United States, nor person owing duty of obedience to the laws or the treaties of the United States, nor any person belonging to or on board of a vessel of the United States, shall kill, capture, or hunt, at any time or in any manner whatever, any fur seal in the waters of the Pacific Ocean north of the thirty-fifth degree of north latitude and including Bering Sea and the Sea of Okhotsk.

SEC. 2. That no citizen of the United States, nor person above described in section 1, shall equip, use, or employ, or furnish aid in equipping, using, or employing, or furnish supplies to any vessel used or employed, or to be used or employed, in carrying on or taking part in said killing, capturing, or hunting of fur seals in said waters, nor shall any vessel of the United States be so used or employed.

SEC. 3. That every person guilty of a violation of the provisions of this act, or of any regulations made thereunder, shall, for each offense, be fined not less than $200, or imprisoned not more than six months, or both; and every vessel, its tackle, apparel, furniture, and cargo, at any time used or employed in violation of this act, or of the regulations made thereunder, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 4. That if any vessel of the United States shall be found within the waters to which this act applies, having on board fur-seal skins or bodies of seals, or apparatus or implements suitable for killing or taking seals, it shall be presumed that such vessel was used or employed in the killing of said seals, or that said apparatus or implements were used in violation of this act, until the contrary is proved to the satisfaction of the court.

SEC. 5. That any violation of this act, or of the regulations thereunder, may be prosecuted either in the district court of Alaska or in any district court of the United States in California, Oregon, or Washington.

SEC. 6. That this act shall not interfere with the privileges accorded to Indians dwelling on the coast of the United States under section 6 of the act of April 6, 1894, but the limitations prescribed in said act shall remain in full force.

SEC. 7. That this act shall not affect in any way the killing or taking of fur seals upon the Pribilof Islands or the laws of the United States relating thereto.

SEC. 8. That any officer of the naval or Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, and any other officers duly designated by the President, may search any vessel of the United States in port or on the high seas suspected of having violated or of having an intention to violate the provisions of this act, and may seize such vessel and offending officers and crew and bring them into the most accessible port of the United States and territory mentioned in section 5 of this act for trial.

SEC. 9. That the importation into the United States by any person whatsoever of fur-seal skins, taken in the waters mentioned in this act, whether raw, dressed, dyed, or manufactured, is hereby prohibited, and all such articles imported after this act shall take effect shall not be permitted to be exported, but shall be seized by the proper officers of the United States.

SEC. 10. That the President shall have power to make all necessary regulations to carry this act into effect.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like some explanation from the gentleman from Illinois as to why this extraordinary bill should pass at this time by unanimous consent.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I will explain to the gentleman and to the House respecting this measure.

A law passed by Congress a number of years ago prohibited the killing of seals in the waters of Alaska. By a subsequent act this was extended to a prohibition against the killing of seals in all our dominions in the Bering Sea. Subsequently, by treaty, we referred the question of jurisdiction upon the high seas to the tribunal of arbitration at Paris. We had contended that we had jurisdiction over the seals which had their habitat or home on the Pribilof Islands, even when the seals were on the high seas in their annual migration.

The British Government contended that we had no jurisdiction on the high seas, and the tribunal, after hearing the question, decided against us and declared that the jurisdiction of the United States was confined to the waters within 3 miles of our own coast. This being done pursuant to a treaty, the tribunal's decision became binding upon us with all the authority of law. A subsequent act of Congress was passed to carry out the treaty and findings. This annulled the old prohibitive law, and this bill is to prohibit our own citizens from killing on the high seas.

At the present time negotiations are going on to discourage, prevent, and, if possible, stop pelagic sealing or the catching of seals on the high seas. But, Mr. Speaker, while we are urging this action on foreign governments, and upon the British Government especially, and while we have succeeded in obtaining assent by the Russian and the Japanese Governments, the British Government answers us, "Why, if you consider this pelagic sealing barbarous and contrary to the interests of mankind, do you allow your own citizens to engage in such business?" So we are in the position of asking several other nations to join us in an effort to prevent pelagic sealing or the killing of seals on the high seas when our own citizens are privileged to do it with impunity.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HITT. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. If this bill becomes a law, will it not be a restriction and limitation upon pelagic sealing upon our own citizens, which we can not enforce against the subjects of a foreign government?

Mr. HITT. We can not enforce our jurisdiction and authority on the high seas except upon American citizens.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then the American citizen, if this law became operative, would be debarred from catching seals under the circumstances the gentleman mentions, while it would not apply to Canadian citizens?

Mr. HITT. The American citizen, if this became a law, would be prevented from killing seals on the high seas. That is the effect of it; and we ask this legislation in order that we may be placed, or that we place ourselves, in a proper position to make the same request of the citizens of foreign governments.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, stop them, and we will agree to it.

Mr. HITT. But we are put in an illogical position so that we can not stop foreign governments. They will say that we can not be sincere in our claim that it is barbarous.

Mr. HOPKINS. Has the gentleman any information to give to this House that if this bill becomes a law by act of Congress that England will stop the Canadians and other British subjects from pelagic sealing?

Mr. HITT. I am sorry to say I have no authority to speak for the Government of Great Britain. The letter of the Secretary of State puts this question very practically. It is, perhaps, a little longer than the House might wish to hear read at this late hour. That letter and the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury are contained in the report of the committee, and explain how, both in the negotiation and in the point of view of administration, it is specially desirable that this law should be enacted, for the sealing fleet will soon be ready to depart. The letter from the Secretary of State urges that it be passed immediately, because he is engaged upon this very negotiation, and the absence of this legislation embarrasses him at every step.

Mr. McRAE. Does not the gentleman believe that it would be better to limit this act to the time when these negotiations are pending? I have in mind the very same idea that was suggested by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. HOPKINS], that we are putting restrictions upon our own citizens which would not apply to people outside. If we make this permanent law, and then fail to secure that which we ask, these restrictions secure to the citizens of other governments all that they want, and we secure nothing. So far as I am concerned, I want to ask one other question, which will perhaps settle the matter with me. Has this bill been reported unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. HITT. It has been unanimously reported. It was very carefully considered, and the bill was drawn by the officers of the Treasury Department, and amended, revised, and most carefully considered in the State Department. It was then considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and unanimously agreed to. Now, we have another law, which was presented by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], which provides that on the failure of all these negotiations we may sweep away the seals; but in the meantime we are sincerely desirous of conducting successful negotiations which will unite these nations, so that we can protect the seal, so that its commercial existence will continue, so that the Pribilof Islands will remain a profitable property. This legislation will put us in a consistent position in those negotiations.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I wish to ask my colleague whether the British Government, or any other government, has passed any law similar to the one which is sought to be enacted in this bill?

Mr. HITT. They have not. We are the owners of the seals. That is, we contend we own them; certainly when on the islands. They all come from the Pribilof Islands, save a few from the Japanese and Russian islands, and we are contending for the assent of other governments to the protection of what we believe to be a very valuable property, which is essentially our own, not only while they are on the islands, but on the high seas.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask a question.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that my colleague has asked unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill, and I understand the consent has been granted.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. No; it has not yet been granted.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will ask my question after the gentleman gets his consent.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I should like to know what opportunity there will be for discussion, for I am sure that with reasonable discussion there will be a powerful opposition developed to this bill. We have passed bills again and again on this sealing question by unanimous consent and there has never been an opportunity for the opposition to be heard. I for one should like to be heard, and I wish to know, if we are going to pass this bill, what opportunity there will be for discussion?

Mr. HITT. Well, I did not suppose there would be any desire for discussion, for I knew of no one who was opposed to the bill, either outside of the House or inside of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I for one would be very glad to have an hour in opposition to this bill.

Mr. HITT. It is a reenactment, in great part, of our old law.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I know, but it is not a reenactment of the condition that prevailed before 1890, when it was possible to save the seal herd. Now, it is as impossible to save the seals as it is to save the buffaloes, and the entire purpose, or at least the entire effect, of this legislation will be to perpetuate an opportunity for a lot of favorites to draw a lot of money out of the Federal Treasury. The Federal Treasury will never get another dollar out of the seal herd. That is my theory of the question. We have spent two and one-half million dollars on this subject within the last few years, which money has been paid out to favorites, and we have only got $70,000 in return. We shall never get another dollar from this source, in my opinion.

We shall spend a lot of money, perhaps, to employ deputies to chase these poachers all over the Pacific Ocean. It is an opportunity to afford splendid berths for a lot of favorites, and that is all there is to it. If you are serious about wanting to retrench the expenditures of the Government, you will stop throwing away the money of the people in an attempt to save the seal herd, which is absolutely doomed. It is kicking against nature and against civilization. You can not do it, no matter how much money you spend.

Mr. HITT. The view of the gentleman from North Dakota is provided for in an act already passed, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], for the destruction of the herd if all other efforts fail. This act is in the direction of an effort to save it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what is before the House.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Then I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If the bill is being debated, it must be before the House; and if it is not before the House, I do not see how it can be debated, under the rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I shall have to object unless there is an opportunity for discussion.

Mr. HITT. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I should like an hour.

Mr. HITT. Suppose we take an hour, and have half an hour on each side.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not this evening.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. If no one else wishes to speak in opposition to the bill, I would be content with thirty minutes; but I dare say after debate shall have proceeded for some time others will desire to take part in the debate.

Mr. HITT. I will agree to an hour, and give the gentleman thirty minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That will keep us here after dinner time, and I do not believe that we should agree to take up the bill and discuss it for an hour this evening.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I submit that under the rules the House in twelve minutes will be in recess, and there will be no time for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The point is well taken.

Mr. HITT. I have no desire to have it passed to-day at all. I supposed that there would be no opposition to the bill. Everything that I had heard was favorable to the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I only wish to say, in explanation of my position, that I do not object to the consideration of the bill. I think the bill ought to pass; but I do object to staying here at this late hour of the day to have it discussed.

Mr. HITT. It can be taken up now and discussed on Monday, with an hour for debate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LOUD. Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall object to fixing a time for debate.

Mr. McRAE. I understand——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California objects.

Mr. LOUD. I prefer that the matter should come up in its regular order and then determine what debate there should be. There is a great deal of sentiment about these seals. They eat more fish in one year than all the furs ever created are worth. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. LOUD. They are destroying our fish industries on the Pacific Coast.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. OVERSTREET, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of William T. Rominger, Fifty-fourth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, caused to be presented to the House the bill H. R. 2580, in order that it might be sent to the Committee on Pensions, stating that it had been sent to the Committee on the Judiciary by error. The Chair thinks there is a mistake, and it originally went to the Committee on Pensions. Without objection, the proceedings of this morning in regard to it will be vacated. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to sit during sessions of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, December 13.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, together with a report of Captain Chittenden of a preliminary examination made by him, in compliance with the river and harbor act, of certain reservoir sites in the States of Wyoming and Colorado—to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, and ordered to be printed.

QUARANTINE STATION AT SHIP ISLAND, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. WALTHALL. I submit a resolution, which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas under and by virtue of an act entitled "An act to authorize the removal of the quarantine station from Ship Island, Mississippi," approved March 3, 1883, said quarantine station was removed to Chandeleur Island, in the Gulf of Mexico, such removal having been recommended by the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service on account of the proximity of that island to the mainland; and

Whereas said quarantine station was afterwards, to wit, in the year 1893, transferred back to Ship Island without any authority of law previously obtained; and

Whereas many eminent physicians and other persons interested in the subject have expressed their belief that the appearance of yellow fever on the Gulf coast of Mississippi in the summer of 1897 was due to the proximity of said quarantine station on Ship Island to the mainland: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine be, and they are hereby, directed to investigate and report whether it is not advisable that said quarantine station be again removed from Ship Island to some more remote point in the Gulf, and if so, what further legislation is necessary for the accomplishment of that purpose.

And said committee may report by bill or otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Mississippi the resolution will lie on the table.

REPORT OF EXPEDITION TO ALASKA.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies of Senate Executive Document 125, second session, Forty-ninth Congress, entitled Report of an Expedition to the Copper, Tanana, and Koyukuk Rivers, in the Territory of Alaska, 1,500 copies to be for the use of the Senate, 3,500 copies to be for the use of the House of Representatives.

WORK OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Civil Service Commission be, and hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate, at the earliest date practicable, a statement, by fiscal years since 1890, showing the total number of persons examined, the total number passed, and the total number appointed in the several branches of the Government service, as classified by the commission, and the total number of persons on the eligible lists of the several branches of the civil service at the beginning of each of those fiscal years.

HYDROGRAPHIC CHARTS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is directed to send to the Senate 100 copies, each, of the two charts recently prepared in the Bureau of Hydrography, and lithographed, showing the sailing routes of steam vessels of heavy burden on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the location of their coasts and the islands in those oceans.

AFFAIRS OF OSAGE INDIANS.

Mr. BATE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Whereas it appears from the records of the Indian Office that there was made from the "accumulated interest" of the trust fund of the Osage Indians, of Oklahoma Territory, numbering less than 1,600 persons, two special payments, one in January and February, 1893, of $300,000, and another in January, 1895, of $200,000, besides their regular quarterly payments of $90,000 ($360,000 annually), or a grand total for four years of $1,940,000, together with the interest on their school funds sufficiently large to educate their children; and

Whereas the report of Lieut. Col. H. B. Freeman, in charge of the agency of said Indians, of September 30, 1897, shows that the full-bloods alone, numbering about 900 persons, were indebted to the traders in the sum of $342,298, prior to the last quarterly payment, of which $35,000 were credited thereon, leaving a balance now due on said indebtedness to the traders alone of more than $300,000; that said Indians have the use and profits arising from 1,570,195 acres of land, much of which is leased out and yields for their benefit several thousand dollars annually; and in said report the said agent, among other things, says: "I am beginning to realize the futility of any effort to keep the Indians down, on the one hand, and restrain the illicit traders on the other, and in view of their said condition recommend the gradual extinguishment of their entire trust fund of $3,430,312.60."

Resolved, That the honorable Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of said agent's report, a statement of the payments of all kinds made to said Indians since January 1, 1892, the number and names of the licensed traders since January 1, 1892, upon said reservation, the length of time they have been doing business on said reservation, and itemized bills of purchases made by said Indians from said licensed traders covering said period, said bills to show the debits and credits, and also what action, if any, has been taken or contemplated by the Department on said report of said agent.

HEIRS OF JACOB R. DAVIS.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 57) for the relief of the heirs of Jacob R. Davis.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to the heirs of Jacob R. Davis, as full compensation for services by Jacob R. Davis, deceased, rendered as agent and judge of the Freedman's Bureau at Augusta, in the State of Georgia, from June 1, 1866, to June 1, 1867, inclusive.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF FUR SEALS.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 2612) prohibiting the killing of fur seals in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean be now considered.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the bill be read for information.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill. I intended to give notice of the amendment this morning, but I have it not quite ready. Therefore I desire that the bill shall go over until to-morrow. To-morrow I shall not object to its consideration.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest that the bill be read and take its place on the Calendar, to be taken up to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie over under objection until to-morrow. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest, to save time, that the bill be read merely by title.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the title of the bill be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2612) prohibiting the killing of fur seals in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie over.

Mr. HALE. What is the understanding? Is it that the bill shall come up to-morrow morning immediately after the routine business?

Mr. DAVIS. It is to come up to-morrow immediately after the routine morning business.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DURHAM, N. C.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1749) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Durham, in the State of North Carolina.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and to cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Durham, N. C., the cost of the site and building, including the vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed $125,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNA W. OSBORNE.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (S. 415) for the relief of Anna W. Osborne.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Anna W. Osborne $600, being the amount of personal property belonging to her and to John W. Osborne, her late husband, of the United States Army, destroyed by fire at the destruction of the post hospital at Fort Ripley, Minn., July 21, 1870.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SECOND HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 364) granting settlers the right to make second homestead entries.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 3, after the word "that," to insert "under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior;" so as to read:

That, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, any person who prior to the passage of this act, having made a homestead entry, but for any cause lost or forfeited the same, or for any reason failed to perfect or secure title in fee simple to the land embraced therein, or who, having perfected or secured such title, did so by what is known as the commutation of his homestead entry under section 2301, United States Revised Statutes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 11, after the words "section 2301, United States Revised Statutes," to insert:

And who is not at the time of the passage of this act the owner of more than 40 acres of land in any State or Territory of the United States.

So as to read:

And who is not at the time of the passage of this act the owner of more than 40 acres of land in any State or Territory of the United States, may make a homestead entry of not exceeding one quarter section of any of the public lands in any State or Territory subject to such entry.

Mr. HALE. The title of the bill embraces enough to cover very important legislation. I do not pretend to know very much as to what is proper or improper legislation about the homestead entries of public lands, but there are Senators here who give special attention to those subjects, and I hope that a bill of this kind will not pass until we have had some assurance that it has been fully considered by the committee having it in charge, and that every amendment which is offered proceeds from the committee with its approval. I wish before going further that the Senator from South Dakota, who has much knowledge and experience on the subject, would explain to the Senate what there is in the bill that is new. What features are comprehended in it that are an innovation on the present homestead law?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The bill was carefully considered by the Committee on Public Lands at the last session and reported, I believe unanimously, from that committee.

It provides that any person not the owner of land exceeding 40 acres can make a homestead entry of 160 acres upon the public domain, whether he has previously taken a homestead or not. That is the sum and substance of the measure. It simply allows landless people, citizens of the United States not now possessed of land, to take a home upon the public domain. If they have previously made an entry and lost it by foreclosure, so that they are without land, they can make another entry. That is all, I believe, there is to the bill.

Mr. MILLS. Would it permit a homesteader who had already made one homestead entry and sold his land to make another?

Mr. PETTIGREW. If he has no land exceeding 40 acres at the time he makes the second entry.

Mr. MILLS. Then he can take and sell and continue to take and sell all the time?

Mr. PETTIGREW. No, he can take one more entry. While we are passing general legislation of course there will be cases where an injustice will be worked, but those cases will be exceedingly small in number, and the general good will be promoted by the passage of this legislation.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the original intention was that there should be a single homestead right, and that when taken advantage of that exhausted the right.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is the original law.

Mr. HALE. That is the theory of the law. I understand that the bill goes further and embraces cases where the law has been taken advantage of, the homestead entered and completed, and the entry parted with.

Mr. MORRILL. Except 40 acres.

Mr. HALE. Parted with except 40 acres. The bill allows such a person, such a homesteader, as he is called, to make another entry. I do not know but that that is right; I do not know but that the committee has considered that subject; but it is clearly a great innovation on what is the general view of the homestead-entry law, which is that a man entering and securing his land exhausts that right. I do not see from the language of the bill why it would not apply to a great many cases of homestead entries where the owner has parted with his title and at once makes another entry. Perhaps that is the best way for the lands to go, but it is not what was the contemplation of the original homestead law. How many cases does the Senator think would be covered by the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. For several sessions the Committee on Public Lands have been constantly importuned by people who desire the right to make another homestead entry, people who lost their lands through no fault of theirs, in many instances owing to the fact that they had made an entry in a country where it was too dry to farm without irrigation and they were unable to irrigate the land; in many cases where they had borrowed money upon the land and it had been foreclosed owing to the failure of crops, which has occurred quite frequently in the arid portions of the United States. After carefully considering all those cases, the committee concluded that it was best to provide that any person who is not the owner of land exceeding 40 acres, and who chooses to go upon the public domain and develop it and improve it and reside not less than fourteen months may acquire such a homestead.

It seems to me that no person who has taken a homestead heretofore and sold it and acquired a large sum of money will go upon the frontier at this time and take another homestead. I am sure that no person within the range of my knowledge who is comfortably fixed anywhere will go out on the frontier and struggle with the wilderness. No person will go beyond the range of roads and schools and all the comforts of civilization and hew out a home upon those plains who is able to stay where those comforts are. Therefore I believe that no injustice, no hardship, no wrong will be done by the passage of the bill. On the contrary, I believe it will induce a class of people to take homesteads and make homes who will be desirable settlers, and it will furnish relief to those people who are the victims of a financial policy advocated by some of the opponents of this measure.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to have the Senator from South Dakota explain a little more fully the meaning of the clause which refers to commutation under section 2301. As I understand the bill, it allows any homesteader who made a homestead entry and then commuted, as it is called, by a cash payment, and so obtained his land, to make another entry if he has not more than 40 acres of land now. Why should an exception be made among homesteaders of those who had the cash to commute to pay at the end of fourteen months?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not know that I fully understand the question of the Senator from Connecticut. Of course where a person commutes a homestead entry he pays $1.25 an acre into the Treasury of the United States, and that class of people very often mortgaged the land. In fact, it is rather the rule that where they did prove up, as they had not the money themselves, they put a mortgage upon the land. In the arid portions of the United States those mortgages have been foreclosed and they have lost their homes. I know of 1,200 people who are living as tenants upon homesteads which they lost in this way. They are the tenants of one mortgage company, the Colonial Mortgage Company, I think. I want to give those people a chance to try again.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But there are other people. A man has made a homestead entry, commuted at the end of fourteen months by paying $1.25 an acre, into a valuable quarter section. He has sold it, realized any amount of money on it which he could sell it for, and retained 40 acres. He can now make another homestead entry under the bill and have what the ordinary homestead entryman does not have—200 acres of land rather than 160 acres. It seems to me that that is not exactly fair.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There will be some cases of that kind, but they will be exceedingly rare. There are very few people who during the last twenty years took homesteads on the frontier in this country who are opulent or possess very much of this world's goods. I do not doubt but that there are some persons who are situated as described by the Senator from Connecticut, but the number is exceedingly small, and in framing general legislation it is impossible to avoid every case that can be imagined. We thought, however, on the whole, taking every circumstance under consideration, that it was best to pass the bill as the committee have reported it. We expected that there would be occasionally a person who would get a homestead under the provisions of the law who was not really in equity entitled to it; but there is one thing certain, Mr. President, those people will pay for all they get if they enter the public domain under the homestead law.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota whether this law will apply to Indian reservations which we have purchased and paid for?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think not. It can not apply to them.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no; it can not.

Mr. ALLISON. It does not apply to them?

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no; it applies only to the public land.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That any person desiring to make another entry under this act will be required to make affidavit, to be transmitted with the other filing papers now required by law, giving the description of the tract formally entered, date and number of entry, and name of the land office where made, or other sufficient data to admit of readily identifying it on the official records.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 3, in the following words:

SEC. 3. That on the proper showing being made by any qualified applicant under this act, to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, that his former entry has been lost or forfeited for any cause, and that he has not perfected or secured title thereto under the homestead law, or who, having perfected title thereto, did so under section 2301 of the United States Revised Statutes, and having all other proper qualifications of a homestead entryman, the register and receiver will, without further showing, on payment of the usual fees and commissions, allow his said application and make his entry of record.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to state at this point that we have purchased and are continually purchasing Indian reservations where the lands are valuable. I think this is a wise bill if it applies only to the public lands of the United States not acquired by purchase. I think there are very few public lands that would be taken up under the bill unless it is applied to Indian lands and Indian reservations that are of value. It seems to me it ought not so to apply, as we are purchasing these lands from the Indians, mainly giving high prices for them, and providing that the lands shall be sold in order that the Government may be reimbursed. If that is made clear and thoroughly understood, I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not think settlers could enter, under the provisions of this bill, land purchased from Indians; but during the last session of this body, almost without a dissenting vote, we passed a bill which provided that any person could take any land purchased from Indians under the general provisions of the homestead law. If that bill should pass the other House, these people would then be allowed to enter that class of lands. Therefore, if we should make an amendment especially excluding these people, when that law passed they would be a class by themselves, excluded from making entries upon those lands, which other people might make. If the Senate desire to make that distinction, I do not know that I have very much objection to it, although it seems to me it is not wise and would not make our legislation uniform.

I have no question in my own mind that this bill, as it now stands, does not permit the entry of those reservations which we have purchased from Indians, because the acts purchasing such reservations provide how the land shall be disposed of.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, on the 7th instant I submitted certain amendments to the bill (S. 2369) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes, which I asked to have laid on the table, the bill being before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, giving notice that I should subsequently ask to have the amendments laid before the Senate for the purpose of submitting some remarks thereon. I now ask that the amendments be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina? The Chair hears none, and the amendments heretofore submitted by the Senator from North Carolina will be read.

The Secretary read the amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. BUTLER, as follows:

In section 2, page 2, line 5, after the word "and," insert "invest for or."

At the end of same paragraph insert: "Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, if he deems it necessary or more practical, establish at first postal savings banks only at the money-order offices of the first, second, and third classes, and then extend the system as rapidly as practicable to all other post-offices named above."

In section 3, line 4, after the word "offices," insert:

"Deposits of married women, or from a single woman who may afterwards marry, shall be kept as her sole and separate property, same as if she were single: and such deposit shall not be subject to the control nor be liable for the debts of her husband.

"Deposits may be made by husbands payable to their wives or any member of their family.

"Parents may accumulate a fund for their growing children by depositing a sum of money for each, to be paid at some specified date or when each child becomes of age."

In line 12, same section, strike out all after the word "attached," down to and including the word "direct," in line 15, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Especially prepared adhesive postal savings stamps."

Same section, page 3, line 25, after the word "cards," insert "and postal savings stamps of the denomination of 1 cent, 4 cents, 5 cents, and 10 cents."

In line 28, same section, after the word "business," insert "every day (Sundays and legal holidays excepted) during the usual business hours of the town or locality where such bank is located, or between such specific hours as the Postmaster-General may direct."

At the end of section 4 insert "and it shall be the duty of every depositor to see that he receives such acknowledgment. If he does not receive the acknowledgment within twenty days of the time of making his deposit with the postmaster, it shall be the duty of the depositor to notify the Postmaster-General of such fact, and to demand from the Postmaster-General the acknowledgment due him."

In section 5, line 6, strike out the words "five dollars," and insert in lieu thereof "one dollar."

In section 7, line 6, after the word "amount," insert "or may issue an order or warrant on any postal savings bank office."

In line 9, same section, after the word "office," insert "but an order or warrant shall be cashed only at the office on which it is drawn."

In section 18, line 8, strike out the word "paid" and insert in lieu thereof "repaid to depositors or invested for them."

In line 11, after the word "class," strike out the semicolon and insert a comma; and strike out the words "also of all" and insert "and a statement of."

In line 12, after the word "incurred," insert a semicolon and the following words: "also a copy of all regulations made and in force and of all changes made in regulations since his last report and the reasons for such changes."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President. the amendments which I have offered, while not materially important, yet perfect the details and machinery of the postal savings banks bill which I offered at the last session of Congress and which is now pending before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

For the past few years I have devoted considerable study to the postal savings bank, postal telegraph, and postal telephone systems now in practical and successful operation in so many other countries. In view of the fact that these important and natural adjuncts of the postal system have long been in successful operation in nearly every other civilized country, in view of the great benefit and convenience to the people accruing from the same, and in view of the fact that we have the machinery already in operation to carry on these important public functions, no less important than the Post-Office Department itself, it is indeed strange that we have so long denied ourselves such important blessings.

I have bills now before Congress providing for the establishment of all of these. I will, however, at this time direct my remarks to the establishment of a postal savings banks system. Such a system was established by Great Britain in 1861; France in 1882; Austria, 1883; Canada, 1868; Italy, 1876; Belgium, 1869; Sweden, 1884; Netherlands, 1881; Sandwich Islands, 1886, etc. In all these countries the plan has worked admirably and is very popular.

Last summer I collected all of the consular reports on postal savings banks that had been published, and secured copies of those which had not been published, and these, together with copies of the laws in other countries establishing their postal savings banks systems, and other information, I had published in a Senate document, No. 154. The demand for copies of this document and copies of my postal savings banks bill was so great that it was necessary to secure the publication of several large extra editions before the last session of Congress adjourned.

Last July the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads referred my bill to the Postmaster-General, requesting him to examine the same and give the committee the benefit of his suggestions and recommendations. He replied that he would take the subject up during the summer, investigate it thoroughly, and transmit to Congress at the next session his views and recommendations. This he has done, and in his annual report has not only strongly indorsed the proposition to establish postal savings banks, but in an admirable argument has favored the establishment of such a system as my bill proposes.

Just before the adjournment of Congress I offered a resolution, which was passed by the Senate, directing the Secretary of State to send out a circular letter to our diplomatic representatives abroad, instructing them to secure from the several Governments to which they are accredited the fullest informatian as to the nature and practical operation of postal savings banks, postal telegraphs, and postal telephones in all countries where the same are in operation. This information will no doubt be transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of State at a very early date. The facts and information which these reports will contain will no doubt convince beyond question a large majority of Congress that our people should be given the benefit of postal savings banks at the earliest day possible.

While the People's Party has from its birth advocated the establishment of postal savings banks, and is the only party that has ever declared for them in its national platform, yet they are to-day advocated by many prominent men in all parties. The popular demand for them has grown until it is no longer a party question.

Seldom, if ever, has there been greater popular interest manifested than has been evidenced during the past summer and fall for the establishment of a system of postal savings banks. The proposition has been discussed by the press from one end of the country to the other, and I think it is safe to say that nine-tenths of the press, if not a larger per cent, heartily favor this proposition. I have noticed carefully for the objections raised against the system. Necessarily they are few, and necessarily they are backed more with opinions and assertions than with arguments and facts.

The objections are, as a rule, from a certain class of bankers who are interested parties and from a certain class of mossback Bourbons, who oppose every step toward progress and every reform, no matter how commendable. The following are the objections which have come under my observation:

First. That postal savings banks smack too much of paternalism. In answer to this we call attention to the fact that the Post-Office Department is paternalism, and that from such paternalism there is not only no harm, but, on the other hand, an incalculable benefit that could not be secured through private enterprise. Government itself is a necessary evil, and postal savings banks, like the Post-Office Department, is necessary paternalism. Any form of government is paternalism. The only question is, How far shall the agencies of government be extended to give the greatest good to the greatest number? In other words, which are proper functions for government and which for private enterprise?

In this connection I wish to quote from the argument in favor of postal savings banks made by the Postmaster-General in his last annual report. In reply to the objection of paternalism, he says:

> Other opponents cry "paternalism." All government is more or less paternal, in that it takes care of the interests of the people. Carrying the mails, excluding disease-infected vessels from the harbors of trade and commerce, preserving the peace, providing for public education, subsidizing agricultural colleges, maintaining agricultural stations, and making Weather Bureau predictions, are all of them paternalistic.

Second. The second objection which I have noticed is that if postal savings banks should be established, that it would be a step in the direction of the Government operating the telegraph and other natural monopolies as public functions. In reply to this alleged objection we say: That it is an admission that postal savings banks would work successfully and be popular, and that their successful operation would be a strong argument for other reforms along the same line. This is an objection only with the monopolists. It is a strong argument in favor of the system with ninety-nine citizens out of every hundred.

Third. That the Government ought to go out of the banking business, and that postal savings banks would put the Government a step further into the banking business. In reply to this objection we say: That none except those who want to control the nation's money and use this powerful instrument of commerce as a means to force the whole producing world to pay tribute to the money changers can consider this an objection. With all who stand on the money question where Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln stood, it is a strong argument in favor of postal savings banks.

Fourth. That the money collected through the savings banks scattered over the country would be concentrated and hoarded at Washington, and thus cause a contraction and congestion of the currency. In reply to this objection, we call attention to the fact that my bill now pending before Congress amply provides against any such danger or contingency, and it might be stated in addition that those who have made this objection, as far as my observation goes, are those who have been striving to contract and congest the currency of the country for the last thirty years. They want the money deposited in private and corporate banks in order that they may congest it at will. A proper postal savings bank system, like the one my bill would establish, will to no small degree prevent the very evils which national banks have been producing.

In this connection I quote again from the report of the Postmaster-General answering the same objection:

> Some affect to see the specter of centralization in the postal savings system. It is true that it operates directly to centralize capital, but only that it may be redistributed and thus put to use.

In another part of his admirable argument, referring to the same objection, he says:

It is claimed that it would take money out of communities already suffering for want of currency. On the contrary, it would gather together the money now hidden and idle in every community, and enable each of them to get the use in bulk, at the shortest possible notice, of all the reserve capital in the community. While the funds thus gathered from the community would probably be sent to the financial centers, they would be returned, through safe and proper channels, to move the crops and to perform their other customary duties.

In this connection I wish also to call attention to the argument made by Postmaster-General Creswell in 1873, advocating postal savings banks and answering the same objection. He said:

If to establish postal savings depositories would be in violation of the Constitution, there is an end of the matter at once. If, on the contrary, such action would not be unconstitutional, then the only question is whether their establishment would on the whole be advantageous for the people and the Government. Since the National Government has assumed to organize and control the banking of the country, and has found warrant of law for undertaking the transmission of the people's money through the mails, it would appear that it is only discharging its whole duty and completing its financial work by providing for the safety of the small savings of the industrious and frugal poor.

If, in addition, it can be shown that postal savings depositories will serve to fortify the national credit, make more equable the financial operations of the country, cultivate habits of thrift among the industrial classes, and illustrate the excellence of our institutions by protecting and augmenting the accumulations of self-denying toil, and thus in time merging the workman into the capitalist, the cry of centralization can not be made to drown the voice of the people in their demand that the Government of the United States shall execute for their benefit the high offices enjoined upon it by the Constitution.

Fifth. The fifth objection I have noticed during the past summer is, that private enterprise can furnish all of the savings banks necessary. In answer to this objection we call attention to the fact that in all of the twelve Northern, Eastern, and Middle States, where population is densest and where private savings banks are greater in number, there are to-day only 620 mutual savings banks and 140 commercial savings banks, 760 savings banks in all, covering a population of over thirty millions of people, which averages 1 savings bank to every 40,000 people.

In those 12 States there are 5,720 money-order post-offices where there are no savings banks of any kind. Surely the people in these States need postal savings banks. In the 13 Southern States there are only 2 mutual savings banks (which are the only real savings banks) and 110 commercial savings banks (which can hardly be called savings banks), 112 in all, covering a population of 18,000,000 people. There are in these States 3,980 money-order offices where there are no savings banks of any kind. And in the 16 Western States there are only 7 mutual savings banks and 420 commercial banks, making 427 in all, covering a population of over 32,000,000 people. There are in these States 6,771 money-order offices where there are no savings banks of any kind. The 4 Pacific States have 20 mutual savings banks, 50 commercial savings banks, 70 in all, covering a population of 3,000,000. There are in these 4 States 862 money-order offices where there are no savings banks at all.

In short, the 33 Southern, Western, and Pacific States have altogether only 609 savings banks, covering a population of over 52,000,000 people, or one savings bank to 84,000 population. Not 1 in 500 of these people do or can deposit in any of these savings banks. Would this be the case if there were postal savings banks at every postal money order office? In Great Britain, where postal savings banks have long been in successful operation, one person out of every eight of their population has a deposit and bank account. That is nearly one depositor for every voter.

Shall we wait fifty years, or one hundred years, or one thousand years, until countless generations are born and dead, until private capital will see fit to establish a sufficient number of savings banks conveniently located to the people? And even if there were a sufficient number of savings banks, what guaranty is there that they would be any safer and less liable to break and squander the hard-earned savings of the people than those that are now in existence?

In this connection I wish to quote again from the admirable argument made by the Postmaster-General on the same point. Replying to the same objection, he says:

It is often urged that whatever can be as well done by private enterprise as by the Government should never be entered upon by the latter, but a century of demonstration has shown that private enterprise can not supply even adequate means of exchange, let alone the great instrument for the collection and increase of the small savings of the people. Private enterprise, aided and sustained by the Government, with its mantle of security thrown about the national banks, has not been able to keep pace with the growth and needs of the country.

While even the frontier settlements of Finland, Algiers, South Africa, India, Ceylon, South and West Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, Hawaii, and British Columbia are enjoying the blessings of banks of exchange and of interest-paying depositories, private enterprise in this country has left the people of many old communities, and in a few cases of almost entire States, without any facilities whereby they may protect and invest their hard-earned savings.

Sixth. The sixth objection that I have noticed is that there is no way that deposits in the postal savings banks may be utilized or invested by the Government; and here I might say that the opponents of postal savings banks lay stress on this point as their greatest objection to the bill. In reply we call attention to the fact that England has already solved this by investing the postal savings bank funds in English consols, France has solved it by investing in French rentes, and nearly every other country has solved it in practically the same way.

There are numerous ways that our Government can use advantageously the postal savings bank funds. She might build her own postal cars and save the $3,000,000 which we now pay for the rent of postal cars each year. The postal cars that we pay $3,000,000 rent for each year can be built for $1,500,000, and they will last twenty years. Thus, by this one investment alone, our Government can save $1,500,000 the first year and $3,000,000 each year thereafter, or nearly $60,000,000 in twenty years, the life of the postal cars. The funds can be used in erecting public buildings and save millions of dollars that we are now paying yearly for rent.

The funds might be used to build a postal telegraph system or to purchase the system now in operation. Less than $20,000,000 would equip a system superior in quality to the present Western Union telegraph system, which is capitalized at over $100,000,000. It would not only largely extend the number of telegraph offices, but also enable the people to send telegrams of ten words from one end of the country to the other at 10 cents each, and still make a profit for the Government on the investment.

There are dozens of other ways in which the funds can be used similar to the above. My bill provides that the national debt shall be paid off first, and then provides ample methods for other investments of all additional funds.

In this connection I wish to quote the unanswerable argument of the Postmaster-General in reply to the same objection. In his annual report he says:

The system is pronounced impracticable by some for the alleged reason that this country, fortunately unlike the European examples cited in this report, has not enough of a national debt to absorb the hidden savings of the people. There is enough of a national debt, if it should be used for that purpose, to afford investment for such savings during the next ten or fifteen years, after which the wisdom gained from experience may be safely intrusted with the problem of finding other fields of investment in this great and growing country.

The Postmaster-General has given this matter his closest investigation, and here makes a statement that we have already in the national debt a way to invest advantageously these funds for the next ten or fifteen years; and even if we can see no other way now, we certainly can within the next ten or fifteen years.

It is not necessary to refer to these objections further, because the number of persons making them and with whom they have any weight are extremely small, and probably nine out of every ten who have advanced these objections are interested parties. That is, their private interests are against the common good.

In this connection I might refer to some of the many advantages that the establishment of a postal savings bank system would be to our people. It would furnish, first, a convenient place for small deposits, where the security was absolutely perfect—as good as the Government itself.

We are a money-making people, but we are not a money-saving people. It has been said that extravagance and improvidence is the greatest defect in American character. I do not think that the widespread extravagance and improvidence among our people is so much a defect of character as it is a defect of conditions that surround our people. Our people are energetic, industrious, and resourceful. But the earnings of a majority burn a hole through their pockets as rapidly as received, instead of being accumulated and invested.

The earnings, above necessary expenses, with a large majority are so small from day to day or week to week that there is never enough for a permanent and valuable investment unless it is systematically saved for some length of time. To make it possible for those who desire to save, as well as to encourage those to save who have a tendency toward improvidence, it is absolutely necessary to provide not only a sufficient number of savings banks, conveniently located in every section of the country, but there must be no doubt about the security and stability of such institutions. Nothing can supply this need but postal savings banks. The demand for them in this country, together with the experience of other countries, proves this.

Such a system as my bill provides for would make it possible for one hundred people to save their earnings where one now does, and would make it impossible for any depositor to ever lose a cent. This would encourage and stimulate saving, which would not only be a blessing to every family by laying up something for a rainy day, but it would, besides, make every depositor a better citizen. It would not only mean that there would be more comfort in the homes of our people, but it would mean that a greater per cent of the rising generation would be educated and more imbued with the spirit of patriotism.

I can not present stronger reasons for the establishment of such a system than the Postmaster-General has stated in his report. He says:

The establishment of a postal savings system would tend inevitably to the cultivation of thrift in a large class of people. Through its instrumentality, those who have been improvident in little things and who have not learned from experience that money makes money, will be educated slowly but surely to save a surplus over and above their living expenses, to the end that a fund may be created which will provide for them when sickness or old age overtakes them. When they realize that their savings may be so utilized under the direction and care of their Government that even small amounts will earn money for them, it is but reasonable to suppose that they will be incited to greater exercise of thrift and industry.

They would soon come to understand the advantage of depositing with the Government their surplus earnings, instead of expending them wastefully and, therefore, uselessly. If but a small percentage of the money a young person expends unnecessarily, in the many ways known to all, could be saved and wisely invested, there would be a competency at hand when old age comes. The battle of life would be less difficult to fight with the knowledge of reserve forces at hand. The habit of thrift thus formed would result in providing ample means for the enjoyment of the real pleasures of life, while laying in store provision for possible future disaster and infirmity.

Mr. President, his general argument is so strong and convincing that I ask consent to incorporate in my remarks several more paragraphs from the Postmaster-General's report:

In my judgment the establishment of postal savings depositories would tend to better citizenship. If the masses of people were thrifty and saving in their habits, they would more likely be contented and happy; and if their hard-earned savings could be placed in the hands of the Government, in the welfare of which they are all so deeply concerned, it is reasonable to believe that they would come to a better realization of the duties they owe to their country, and consequently to each other.

The union of common interest would surely result in a broader, wiser, and more useful citizenship. The successful operation of a postal savings deposit system would bring into closer relationship the Government and its citizens and result in the development of practical and enduring patriotism. The citizen who feels that he has a personal interest in the affairs of government beyond the payment of his share of taxes and the discharge of those other duties common to all is of more value to the community and the nation than one whose conception of citizenship means merely the performance of those duties. * * *

The advantages to result from the adoption of a system so promising in the growth of patriotic sentiment and good citizenship, in my opinion, constitute a powerful appeal to statesmanship to provide by law for the application and the spread of its beneficent consequences. With the multiplication of depositors would come the elevation of the standard of citizenship, the cementing of the ties that bind the people to the Government, the strengthening of the public credit, and the ultimate betterment of all concerned.

The Postmaster-General in another part of his admirable argument says that the establishment of postal savings banks would put life into dead money that is now hoarded in stockings and chimney corners. He might also have said at the same time that it would put life into dead men and comfort into cheerless homes. Every piece of official information from every country where postal savings banks are in operation bears abundant testimony to these facts and others of similar character.

If any further argument were required to show that it is both wise and necessary to establish postal savings banks, and that there is a great business demand for such institutions, a very strong argument can be deduced from the operation of our money-order system. As everyone knows, our money-order system was established for the convenience of those who do not keep bank accounts, and who, therefore, can not draw checks on such accounts for transmission through the mails. The money-order system furnishes an opportunity, at a small fee, for every individual to buy a money order or a Government check. The business of this department has had a wonderful growth. There are now 21,000 offices of this class, and during the current year there were more than 52,000,000 transactions, by which over $200,000,000 was transmitted by money orders.

But the most interesting thing in connection with the operation of this money-order system is the fact that in every section of the country thousands and hundreds of thousands of people buy money orders, not to send through the mails, but money orders payable to themselves, which they keep to be cashed at some future time. They buy them simply to secure a safe deposit for their money. Thus we see that our people are already using the money-order system as a kind of a postal savings bank, and the remarkable thing about it is that they not only do not get any interest, but pay a fee for the privilege of using the Government as a custodian of their small earnings and savings. There is scarcely a money-order office in the United States that has not had this experience.

The postmaster at Chicago, in a recent interview, stated the extent to which these transactions were carried on in that city. It was enormous. The postmaster at Wilmington, the largest town in my State, told me recently that the extent to which persons bought money orders payable to themselves simply as a safe deposit for their money was really burdensome to the office. In the office of the Superintendent of the Money-Order System of the Post-Office Department here in Washington is evidence which will convince the most skeptical that there exists a great demand for postal savings banks.

As everyone knows, the law declares a money order void when not presented for payment in a year. When the money order is retained by the payee beyond that period it can only be renewed by the Superintendent of the system in Washington, and the number of cases where money orders have been retained for two to three and even more years by persons who bought them payable to themselves is indeed surprising. It is reasonable to suppose that nine out of ten, if not a larger per cent, of those who buy money orders payable to themselves (with no other purpose than to deposit their money where they know it will be safe until wanted) have them cashed before they run out of date.

Hence the thousands upon thousands of money orders sent to the Superintendent of the Money-Order System here in Washington to be renewed, or rather to have a duplicate issued where a money order runs out of date, as provided by law, gives some idea of the enormous extent to which the money-order system is used as a means of deposit. If there were a sufficient number of savings banks, and the people had confidence in them, no one would ever buy a money order for a deposit, whereby he not only loses the interest on his money but pays a fee for the privilege; and with postal savings banks established, especially adapted for such a purpose, it is reasonable to suppose that thousands of persons would deposit in postal savings banks where one buys money orders for depositing for safe security.

Having reached the conclusion that it is wise, proper, and necessary to establish a postal savings bank system, the next important consideration is the kind of a bill that should be enacted into law. The bill which I now have pending was carefully drawn after studying the laws of other countries establishing postal savings banks and the operation of their systems under said laws. Some features have been taken from nearly every system in existence, and adapted, where necessary, to the conditions that exist in this country; and besides, a few new features, principally referring to details, have been added.

Since the introduction of my bill last summer I have received hundreds of letters from people in every quarter of the country interested in postal savings banks, including lawyers, business men, bankers, and nearly every class of society, discussing the proposition, criticising or commending the bill, and making divers suggestions. The few amendments which I have offered this morning are the result of a careful digestion of all of these suggestions.

One gentleman with whom I have had considerable interesting correspondence, and who has prepared a bill of his own, is Mr. Bell, a banker in St. Louis, Mo. I notice that his bill was introduced in the House on Monday by Mr. BARTHOLDT of Missouri. Mr. Bell has done me the honor, with my permission, to copy many paragraphs from my bill. I am especially gratified that he has given his indorsement to that provision of my bill which requires the Government, upon the request of depositors, to issue to them postal savings banks bonds in small denominations bearing 2.4 per cent interest in lieu of their deposits. I regret that the Chicago Record bill, which was introduced in the House by Mr. LORIMER on Monday and in the Senate by Mr. MASON on Tuesday, does not contain the same provision. While a number have made objection to this provision, yet no one has given any good reason for objecting, while surely there are many good reasons for its adoption. There are sufficient precedents for this in other countries; and even if there were not, the proposition could stand on its own merits.

Over one-half of the consols of Great Britain are to-day held by the depositors of postal savings banks. In that country anyone wishing to do so can begin to purchase the consols by depositing the sum of 1 shilling, and can continue to purchase until he has accumulated $2,500 worth. Not more than $1,000 worth can be purchased in any one year. My bill makes the same limitations. France has also set us a splendid example in this direction by issuing bonds known as French rentes to depositors for amounts as low as $4. Thus the French debt is held by the masses of her people, and this explains why France, though frequently more heavily in debt than any other country in the world, has yet never been embarrassed by her public debt, but has really seemed to prosper on it or rather in spite of it. There has been no drain abroad to pay interest or principal; but it has all been paid out and continued to circulate among her own people.

In fact, with my bill enacted into law, it would be impossible for there ever to be another bond scandal. Indeed, there would never be another issue of bonds except to our own people, and then they would be sold in small denominations at the postal savings bank offices, provided the Government needed to raise more money than the amount of postal savings bank deposits. If any public debt can ever be a public blessing, then surely it must be this kind of a public debt, which is held by the masses of the people, prevents any drain of interest abroad, and keeps the money paid for interest circulating among our own people.

There are at least two other noticeable differences between my bill and those of the Chicago Record and Mr. Bell, both of which have been introduced in the last few days. Both of those bills provide for only 2 per cent interest on deposits. Why they should put the interest so low I can not understand, and certainly there has been no good reason advanced, so far as I have seen. Besides there is no precedent for it in countries where the postal savings banks are in successful operation. Germany pays 3 per cent. Canada pays 3 per cent, and until recently paid as high as 3½ and 4 per cent. England pays 2½ per cent, and until recently paid as high as 3 per cent. My bill provides for 2½ per cent interest, and this is the lowest paid in any country, and surely our American people are entitled to that much.

The average rate of interest in countries having postal savings banks is 3½ per cent. The average interest paid by private savings banks in this country is 3½ per cent. With postal savings banks paying 2½ per cent, the private savings banks will have the advantage of 1 per cent interest in their favor. That is, they can offer an inducement of that much higher interest to every depositor, and all the private savings banks would have to do to get all of the deposits of the people would be to place their banks conveniently to the people and establish confidence that they were as safe as the Government banks.

Another marked difference between Mr. Bell's bill and the Record bill and my bill is that they permit no deposits smaller than $1. That is the limit fixed in the Record bill, and I think the same in all the other bills now pending. What reason there is for this limitation, I am unable to comprehend, and they have as yet advanced no satisfactory reasons that I have seen. The report on postal savings banks in other countries shows that the majority of the deposits are less than $1 in amount. In Austria 20 per cent of the deposits are for amounts under 20 cents, and 23 per cent of the deposits are for amounts between 20 cents and $1. Thus we see that 43 per cent of the deposits in that country are for amounts less than $1.

When we take into consideration the fact that it is those who have less than $1 to deposit who are most liable to waste their money, and for whose benefit the system would be especially established, it would seem that there is every reason why the limit should be put extremely low. The bill I have introduced provides for deposits as small as 10 cents, and for a plan of postal savings stamps to be attached to cards by which 1 cent and upward can be saved. No system of postal savings banks should be established that would not encourage the man to deposit his dimes instead of blowing them into dramshops and beer saloons.

In this connection I wish to say that the Chicago Record, though I can not support some features of its bill, has done a valuable service in arousing public interest in the subject of postal savings banks.

The report on postal savings banks in foreign countries shows that a very important feature is the habit of saving inculcated in children, encouraging them to save their pennies, which not only soon accumulate into a considerable sum, but besides, and still more important, inculcate habits of saving that grow through a lifetime and make a valuable and prosperous citizen out of what might have been a worthless spendthrift or vagabond. It is an old adage that if we take care of the pennies the dollars will take care of themselves. The great truth contained in this adage is the corner stone on which postal savings banks should be founded.

To sum up, Mr. President, the advantages which would accrue to the people from the establishment of a system of postal savings banks are many and of very great importance. The indirect benefit would be no less appreciated than that which would arise from giving to the people an absolutely safe depository for their earnings and allowing them interest on the same. It would add to the circulating volume of money; bring out of hiding and put to active work the dead capital now hidden away. In a direct way it would benefit the holders of this dead capital by giving them not only an absolute security for their money, but also a return in the way of interest. It would give to men of small means an incentive to increase their capital. With an account once opened, no matter how small the account might be, the depositor would be encouraged to double his efforts to save, and thus have, in the shape of a bank account, evidence of the fruits of his labor, which he now often in vain endeavors to find traces of.

The American people, it is said, are conspicuous for their ability to earn money, but have not the habit of saving it. This is in a very large measure due to a lack of facilities to the men of small means for saving. Postal savings banks will supply this need. The successful operation of a postal savings bank system would tend to elevate the social, moral, and industrial standard of our people. It would encourage thrift; it would lessen poverty and want; it would rob the almshouses of much of the work with which they are now overburdened; it will educate the young into knowledge of economy and the proper use and value of money; it would result in transferring the whole national debt within a few years from the hands of the bankers and bondholders into the hands of the great masses of our people.

If it accomplished this alone it would be wise and timely legislation. But that is only one of the hundreds of benefits which will accrue to our people from the establishment of such a system.

In conclusion, it would have a widespread and powerful influence in removing one of the greatest dangers that now threaten the very existence of the Republic. Every patriot and every believer in a republican form of government, no matter how much his heart may bleed at the increasing suffering and want caused by unjust and vicious laws, prays that these wrongs and oppressions may be removed and righted by an intelligent use of the ballot. He knows that mob violence or revolution by an overburdened, robbed, and exasperated populace would not only fail to right the wrongs, but would result in bloodshed, loss of property, and possibly the overthrow of the Government. This is the danger.

Now, every man who has a bank account with the Government, however small, would be less liable to join in mob violence or revolution. He would appeal to his neighbors to redeem the Government with ballots, and not to destroy it with bullets. This matter is of no little moment and is worthy of the highest statesmanship. In short, the few flimsy objections to the establishment of such a system pale into insignificance in comparison with not only the many important direct benefits to the depositors, but also the far-reaching advantages that would accrue to the nation as a whole.

I move that the amendments which I have offered be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, which has the bill under consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

REPRINTING OF BOWMAN ACT.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that 500 copies of the law of March 3, 1883, chapter 116, called the Bowman Act, be printed for the use of the Senate document room. It will cost a very small sum. All the sheet copies of it are gone, and it is a law which we frequently have to use, sending it to claimants.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Are there not some amendments to the law which ought to be printed with the original law?

Mr. COCKRELL. No amendments have been made to the law that I know of. If there have been any amendments, they will be included. Mr. Amzi Smith will prepare the copy for the printer. A few minutes ago I sent to his room for a copy and could not get one, and I ask that the act may be reprinted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the printing will be ordered. The Chair hears none.

ADDITION TO THE LOS ANGELES (CAL.) PUBLIC BUILDING.

Mr. WHITE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2074) providing for the erection of an addition to the public building at Los Angeles, Cal., and appropriating money therefor.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to procure a site for and cause to be erected thereon a suitable addition to the public building in Los Angeles, Cal., at a cost not to exceed, for the site and all improvements and additions, complete, $250,000. An appropriation of $100,000 is proposed to be made for the purchase of the site and the commencement of the additional building.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. HARRIET D. NEWSON.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 884) for the relief of Mrs. Harriet D. Newson be now considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Mrs. Harriet D. Newson, widow of Thomas M. Newson, late United States consul at Malaga, a sum of money equal to one year's salary of that consul, together with $197, which was collected from the estate of Thomas Newson by the Government of the United States after his death.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. GORMAN. It is the desire of Senators on this side of the Chamber to make quite a number of changes in the membership of various committees. I have reduced the changes to the form of orders, and I ask for their present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The orders will be considered at the present time, in the absence of objection.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following order; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Ordered, That Mr. JONES of Arkansas be excused from service as chairman of the Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia;

That Mr. GRAY be excused from service as chairman of the Select Committee to Investigate the Condition of the Potomac River Front at Washington;

That Mr. GORMAN be excused from service as chairman of the Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress and as a member of the Committee on Commerce;

That Mr. BERRY be excused from service as chairman of the Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians and as a member of the Committees on Patents and Private Land Claims;

That Mr. DANIEL be excused from service as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds;

That Mr. FAULKNER be excused from service as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections;
That Mr. WALTHALL be excused from service as a member of the Committee on the Geological Survey;
That Mr. MALLORY be excused from service as a member of the Committee on Railroads;
That Mr. PETTUS be excused from service as a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following order; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Ordered, That Mr. JONES of Arkansas be appointed chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims;
That Mr. DANIEL be appointed chairman of the Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia;
That Mr. TURPIE be appointed chairman of the Committee to Investigate the Condition of the Potomac River Front at Washington;
That Mr. BERRY be appointed chairman of the Committee on Woman Suffrage;
That Mr. GRAY be appointed chairman of the Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress;
That Mr. PASCO be appointed chairman of the Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians;
That Mr. DANIEL be appointed a member of the Committee on Finance;
That Mr. MILLS be appointed a member of the Committee on Commerce;
That Mr. FAULKNER be appointed a member of the Committee on the Judiciary;
That Mr. PETTUS be appointed a member of the Committee on the Judiciary;
That Mr. GORMAN be appointed a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia;
That Mr. MALLORY be appointed a member of the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine;
That Mr. WALTHALL be appointed a member of the Committee on Rules;
That Mr. MONEY be appointed a member of the Committees on Agriculture and Forestry, Railroads, Post-Offices and Post-Roads, Public Buildings and Grounds, Geological Survey;
That Mr. TURLEY be appointed a member of the Committees on Private Land Claims, Privileges and Elections, Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, Education and Labor, Patents.

LANDS IN OREGON.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 746) to provide for the examination and classification of certain lands in the State of Oregon.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STEWART. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon, as it is quite an elaborate bill, to let it lie over a day or two, as I should like to look at it. Let that be done without prejudice to the bill. I do not wish to antagonize it, but I desire to examine its provisions. I think that is a fair course to pursue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada object——

Mr. STEWART. I do not object to the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STEWART. I simply suggest to the Senator from Oregon to let the bill lie over for a day or two. I do not want to object, so as to cause the bill to lose its place.

Mr. MCBRIDE. In view of the request of the Senator from Nevada that he may be given a day or two in which to examine the bill, I am willing that it shall lie over if it will not lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie over without prejudice.

DONATION OF ORDNANCE TO MILWAUKEE.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 53.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 112) to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that a joint resolution which he has sent to the desk may be now considered.

Mr. LODGE. Is the unfinished business before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is before the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. It will take but a moment to pass the joint resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let the title of the joint resolution which the Senator from Wisconsin wishes to have taken up be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 53) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the mayor of the city of Milwaukee, for use in ornamenting one of the parks of that city, the Parrott rifled cannon and carriage recently used on the revenue cutter Andrew Johnson; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "authorized," to strike out "and directed" and insert "in his discretion;" so as to read:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to deliver to the mayor of the city of Milwaukee, for use in ornamenting one of the parks of said city, the Parrott rifled cannon and carriage recently used on the revenue cutter Andrew Johnson, but since discarded, and now stored in the yard of the Milwaukee Dry Dock Company.

Mr. LODGE. I make no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I trust that, after it is disposed of, we may proceed with the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. Regular order.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 112) to amend the immigration laws of the United States; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act of March 3, 1891, in amendment of the immigration and contract-labor acts, be, and hereby is, amended by adding to the classes of aliens thereby excluded from admission to the United States the following:

"All persons physically capable and over 16 years of age who can not read and write the English language or some other language; but a person not so able to read and write who is over 50 years of age and is the parent or grandparent of a qualified immigrant over 21 years of age and capable of supporting such parent or grandparent may accompany such immigrant, or such a parent or grandparent may be sent for and come to join the family of a child or grandchild over 21 years of age similarly qualified and capable, and a wife or minor child not so able to read and write may accompany or be sent for and come to join the husband or parent similarly qualified and capable."

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of testing the ability of the immigrant to read and write, as required by the foregoing section, the inspection officers shall be furnished with copies of the Constitution of the United States, printed on numbered uniform pasteboard slips, each containing not less than 20 nor more than 25 words of said Constitution printed in the various languages of the immigrants in double small pica type. These slips shall be kept in boxes made for that purpose, and so constructed as to conceal the slip from view, each box to contain slips of but one language, and the immigrant may designate the language in which he prefers the test shall be made. Each immigrant shall be required to draw one of said slips from the box and read, and afterwards write out, in full view of the immigration officers, the words printed thereon. Each slip shall be returned to the box immediately after the test is finished, and the contents of the box shall be shaken up by an inspection officer before another drawing is made. No immigrant failing to read and write out the slip thus drawn by him shall be admitted, but he shall be returned to the country from which he came at the expense of the steamship or railroad company which brought him, as now provided by law. The inspection officers shall keep in each box at all times a full number of said printed pasteboard slips, and in the case of each excluded immigrant shall keep a certified memorandum of the number of the slip which the said immigrant failed to read or copy out in writing. If in any case, from any unavoidable cause, the foregoing slips are not at hand for use the inspection officers shall carefully and thoroughly test the ability of the immigrant to read and write, using the most appropriate and available means at their command, and shall state fully in writing the reasons why the slips are lacking, and describe the substitute method adopted for testing the ability of the immigrant.

SEC. 3. That this act shall not apply to persons arriving in the United States from any port or place in the Island of Cuba during the continuance of the present disorders there who have heretofore been inhabitants of that island.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect three months after its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, please have the title of the bill again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire if this is the bill introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] upon the subject of restricting immigration?

Mr. LODGE. It is the bill which passed the Senate and was fully debated at the last Congress, without the House amendments, which caused the last debate, as the Senator will remember—that is, without the Corliss amendment. It is the bill which passed the Senate by a vote of 52 to 10, with some changes which the Senate subsequently desired made and which were made accordingly. The Corliss amendment, which the House put on and which led to the debate, was withdrawn.

Mr. BACON. This is the bill, then, which was finally passed and was vetoed by the President?

Mr. LODGE. It is not the bill which was finally vetoed by the President. It is the Senate bill. It omits the Corliss feature of the proposed legislation.

Mr. BACON. I dislike to plead guilty to inattention, but I confess that I did not know at the time the Secretary was reading the bill that it was a matter of such importance, and therefore I am not in a position to vote intelligently. I have not heard the bill read. It is true, I presume, I did hear it read and I myself read it when it was before the Senate at a previous Congress, but I dislike extremely to be called upon to vote on a measure of such importance without knowing exactly what is in the bill. I would inquire whether the bill has been printed at the present session?

Mr. LODGE. The bill was reported to the Senate on the 22d day of last March and it has been printed and before the Senate ever since that time. It is the same bill that was read over and over again at the last session of the last Congress. There are no changes except the abandonment of the House amendment.

Mr. BACON. Many things have intervened since then and it is not unnatural that a Senator might not now be fully cognizant of what is in a bill which he might heretofore have known quite thoroughly. I am not myself willing to vote for a bill which I can not determine in my mind at the time is one which should properly command my support. It might or it might not command it. I make this statement because, in justice to myself, I am compelled to vote in the negative.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if the bill now before the Senate avoids the questions upon which the veto was based? Are those elements in it?

Mr. LODGE. It abandons absolutely what is known as the Corliss amendment; that is to say, the amendment which affected persons going back and forth across the border, which was the principal ground of opposition in the Senate and the principal ground of the veto. That clause has been entirely abandoned. This is the original Senate bill, which passed the Senate without substantial opposition.

Mr. BACON. The attention of the Senate—certainly not the attention of some of us—was not called to the fact that this is a matter of very grave importance, and we were not giving special attention to what was being read from the desk. I supposed that mere matters of formality were being considered. I therefore ask that the bill be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator from Georgia, the Secretary will again read the bill.

Mr. PETTUS. If the Senator will permit me, I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts to allow the bill to go over until to-morrow without losing its place on the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. There is another matter, I am sorry to say, for which I agreed to withdraw this bill to-morrow—the matter of the census. Notice was given last week of the consideration of this bill, and it was agreed that on Tuesday the census bill should be taken up.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, it seems to me that the bill might go over if Senators are not prepared to vote upon it now and would like to read it, if we could have it agreed that at 4 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, or at 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, the final vote might be taken upon it. Would that suit the Senators who objected on the other side of the Chamber?

Mr. HALE. That would hardly be fitting, as to-morrow has been designated for the consideration of the census measure, and it may be up until the time named.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not think the Senator in charge of the census bill will object if it can be understood that this bill shall be disposed of to-morrow and voted on at any time to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire make that request?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask, with the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the bill may be voted upon finally to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the final vote on the pending bill may be taken to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is objection.

Mr. LODGE. Then, I suppose, we may as well go on with the discussion.

Mr. BACON. I have asked for the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading was ordered.

The Secretary again read the bill.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if he can conveniently state to the Senate the classes of immigrants which are excluded by the law as it now exists, the act of March 3, 1891?

Mr. LODGE. In order to do so I shall have to send for a copy of the act.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. With the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts, I can give the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] the information he desires. The classes now excluded are Chinese coolies and women imported for immoral purposes, idiots, insane persons, paupers or persons liable to become a public charge, persons with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, persons who have been convicted of felony or other infamous crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, polygamists, assisted immigrants (unless it is satisfactorily shown on special inquiry that they are found not to belong to one of the foregoing excluded classes), and contract laborers. These are the excluded classes under existing law.

Mr. LODGE. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The present bill adds a new classification—that is, persons physically capable and over 16 years of age who are incapable of reading and writing in some language are to be excluded, except under certain special circumstances.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, in objecting to fixing the time for taking a vote on this bill I did not have any purpose of obstructing a final vote at an early day. I simply think that it is too early in the session to take up a measure of this importance, and without proper consideration and debate put it on its passage. If the Senator from Massachusetts will fix some convenient day next month, so that we may have an opportunity to reexamine the bill and discuss it, I shall not object.

Mr. LODGE. I certainly did not mean to bring the bill up without proper notice. It was reported to the Senate last March, and it has been standing near the head of the Calendar ever since it came up at the last extra session. It came up in due course on the Calendar at this session, and at the request of the Senator from Connecticut, I think it was, I then let it go over so that it might be examined and looked into.

Mr. ALLEN. Such matters are very apt to pass out of our minds.

Mr. LODGE. I brought the bill up last Wednesday and moved that it be made the unfinished business. It was so done, and it has been the unfinished business since that day. As I say, it has been long before the Senate, and every line and sentence in the bill was hammered over in the Senate for hours at the last session. There is not a new word or syllable in it, and I certainly did not intend to bring a new measure of this importance suddenly before the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. No, Mr. President, but it is very natural that the provisions of a bill like this, or, for that matter, any other bill, should pass out of the minds of Senators to some extent in consequence of business coming to them during a vacation, and we do not readily take up the Calendar where we left it at the end of a former session. We scarcely have had time to unpack our trunks and get settled. When the Senator from Massachusetts brought up this matter a few days ago, I supposed it was his purpose to make it the unfinished business and have it debated at times which were convenient until some day, probably next month, when we could agree upon a time for a vote. I am perfectly willing now that the Senator should fix some day, say along about the 15th of January, when a vote shall be taken on the bill; but I am not prepared to say, Mr. President—and that is a thing I want time to settle for myself—that an educational test is the true test of the right of an individual to come to this country. As I am impressed at this time, I think we ought to have some restrictions, possibly more, than we now have on the right of immigration; but I can readily conceive that a very honest but possibly illiterate man may come to this country who has all the qualifications of making a good citizen—honest, industrious, peaceable, and well disposed to the Government—and yet his early surroundings may have been such that he was unable to obtain an education in his own country sufficiently to enable him to read or to write. In such a case as that I am not prepared to say that an educated anarchist or criminal is preferable to such an individual as a citizen. That is one of the features of this bill I should like to examine; and I hope the Senator will ask unanimous consent to have the bill brought to a vote at some time next month, after the Senate reconvenes, so that we may have ten days or two weeks to discuss it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not wish to press the bill unduly, Mr. President, and shall be glad to make an agreement; but it seems to me the bill has been so much discussed that we might agree to take a vote this week. We have this entire week before us, and nothing else pressing. If we can make an agreement for a vote some day this week I shall be very glad to do it.

Mr. ALLEN. Let me suggest to the Senator, why not fix the third Monday in January, at a given hour, if the Senate shall be then in session?

Mr. LODGE. What date will that be?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know what day of the month it will be.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator know whether or not that would be agreeable to all Senators?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know; but so far as I am individually concerned, it would be agreeable to me. I believe we should have ample opportunity to discuss the bill in the meantime.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator can give me the date I shall be perfectly willing to make that agreement, if it is agreeable to the Senate. I have no desire to press the bill unreasonably.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not wish it to be understood that I consider myself in charge of the bill or of any feature of it.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that, of course.

Mr. ALLEN. But, so far as I am concerned, that will give me ample opportunity to express any views I may have and I shall be perfectly willing to vote at that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the third Monday in January will be the 17th day of the month.

Mr. LODGE. I am willing that the 17th day of January, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, shall be fixed as the time for taking the vote.

Mr. ALLEN. Or, if the Senate is not in session then, let the vote be taken the next legislative day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] asks unanimous consent——

Mr. ALLEN. No, Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] asks unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. I make the request upon the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN. I simply made the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the final vote on the immigration bill, so called, and all amendments thereto, may be taken at 3 o'clock on Monday, the 17th day of January next. Is there objection?

Mr. BACON. I desire to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that possibly if put in that shape it might prevent any debate whatever. If he will put the request to the effect that the bill be in order, or that it be taken up at a certain time, and that the vote be taken not later than such an hour on a given day, I shall not object.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that the bill is in order every day at 2 o'clock.

Mr. BACON. If it remains in order then, of course, my suggestion is not pertinent.

Mr. LODGE. It has been made the unfinished business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood before I made the request that either the present chairman of the Committee on Immigration, the Senator from Indiana on my right [Mr. FAIRBANKS], or the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] would insist upon having the bill taken up in the meantime in order to afford plenty of opportunity for debate thereon.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, I understand the bill is before the Senate now.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. And will remain the regular order until finally disposed of?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes; and that it shall be finally disposed of on the day named.

Mr. ALLEN. On the day named.

Mr. LODGE. And any Senator can have the bill taken up and proceed to discuss it any day at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will remain the unfinished business unless some other business interposes to take its place.

Mr. ALLEN. Of course it should be understood that we shall have a right to debate the bill.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not think in my experience in the Senate it has ever been known, where there has been an agreement to vote on any particular bill on any day, that the Senate, by a vote or otherwise, has ever displaced that business. When any Senator desires to debate it at any time between the date of the agreement and the date of the vote, it has always been regarded as having precedence over any other business.

Mr. ALLEN. I presume the only thing that could obstruct it would be appropriation bills, and probably they will not.

Mr. FAULKNER. The appropriation bills will not come in by that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The experience of the Chair agrees with that of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], only the request did not include the proposition that the bill should remain the unfinished business. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the bill remain the unfinished business until the third Monday in January, the 17th day of the month, when the final vote shall be taken at 3 o'clock.

Mr. ALLEN. On the bill and all the amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the bill and all the amendments. Is there objection?

Mr. TELLER. Would that prevent the calling up of other bills unless we get the consent of the Senator who has this bill in charge? Is this bill always to be before the Senate and kept there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be kept before the Senate as unfinished business, but may be informally laid aside by the consent of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. If it is understood that the bill may be informally laid aside, unless some Senator desires to debate it, I do not object; otherwise I shall interpose an objection.

Mr. LODGE. That is understood, of course.

Mr. TELLER. Very well, then; I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and the order will be made.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I wish to give notice that when the consideration of the immigration bill is resumed after the recess, I shall address the Senate in its support.

ACCOUNTS WITH PUBLIC-LAND STATES.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, immediately after the routine morning business, the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 18, being Senate bill 361, reported from the Committee on Public Lands, providing for paying to the public-land States 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sale of public lands. I should like to have the title of the bill stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, immediately after the morning business, there shall be considered the bill the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 361) fixing times when, regulating the manner in which, and declaring the character of the accounts between the United States and the several public-land States, relative to the net proceeds of the sales and other disposition of the public lands made and to be made therein by the United States, which shall hereafter be stated and certified to the Treasury Department for payment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask whether the proposed order will interfere with the consideration of the census bill? I should like to know as to that before giving consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is that the bill the title of which has been read be proceeded with in the morning hour. Of course it can not interfere with the unfinished business, which does not come up until 2 o'clock.

Mr. CHANDLER. The unfinished business is the immigration bill, but I understood the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] to give notice that he would endeavor to proceed with the census bill to-morrow. I am not certain whether it has been made a special order or not. I will only say to the Senator from South Dakota that I think the Senator from Montana will insist upon having the census bill disposed of before the bill which he mentions, provided there shall be debate upon the Senator's bill.

Mr. LODGE. When the immigration bill was taken up on Thursday last, the understanding was reached here in the Senate that that bill, if not sooner disposed of, should not be pressed on Tuesday or Wednesday, and that the census bill should be called up by the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW]?

Mr. BURROWS. What is the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from South Dakota is that the bill the title of which has been read may be taken up for consideration immediately after the morning business to-morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am afraid that that may interfere with the bill of the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire objects.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask if there has been any agreement about the census bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not informed other than the information which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] just gave to the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Of course I do not care to obstruct the passage of the census bill. The census bill, however, will lead to discussion and require some amendment, and I presume we shall spend some time upon it. I think the bill to which I have referred will be disposed of in an hour or two to morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. Suppose, then, the Senator give notice that he will call the bill up to-morrow. If it is not going to interfere with the census bill there will of course be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the statement of the Vice-President in the matter of the census bill from the RECORD of December 9, 1897.

The Secretary read as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Montana [Mr CARTER], that on Tuesday next, if not sooner disposed of, the unfinished business, being Senate bill 112, known as the immigration bill, may be temporarily laid aside, in order that consideration may be given to Senate bill 94, to provide for the Twelfth and subsequent censuses? The Chair hears no objection, and that will be the order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Of course that contemplates taking up the census bill at 2 o'clock and does not interfere at all with the request which I made. Therefore, under those circumstances, I renew my request. I do not care to interfere with the census bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall not object if the Senator is right in his statement that the census bill will come up at 2 o'clock to-morrow and take the place of the unfinished business, the immigration bill, and the Senator from South Dakota desires the benefit of the morning hour.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota is undoubtedly right in his statement. The Senator again asks unanimous consent that the bill the title of which has been read may be taken up immediately after the disposal of the morning business to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WILLIAM W. TUMBLIN.

Mr. PASCO. I ask that the bill (S. 383) granting an increase of pension to William W. Tumblin, of Bradford County, Fla., may be taken up for present consideration. A similar bill passed the Senate during the last Congress, and this bill has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Pensions during the present Congress.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to increase the pension of William W. Tumblin, of Bradford County, Fla., a soldier in the Florida Indian war of 1835, and to pay him $20 a month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SITUATION IN ALASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a letter from the mail carrier between Juneau and Circle City, relative to the situation in Klondike, Alaska; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 14, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 13, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of Friday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 4751) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes; which was read the first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House 2,000 copies of so much of the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations as relates to the Civil Service Commission, being pages 158-311 of the hearings on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for 1899, as printed for said committee, together with the brief of the principal civil-service examinations arranged alphabetically, which exhibits the subjects, scope, and relative weights of such examinations furnished to said Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state for the information of the House that the Committee on Appropriations has gone exhaustively into the question of the administration of the Civil Service Commission. The report of that commission for the past year will not be printed for perhaps a week or two weeks, and possibly the consideration of this bill by the House will be concluded before their annual exhibit will be made to Congress. This matter which we propose to have printed, which is a part of the report of the general testimony before the subcommittee and the general committee, will embrace about 200 pages of print. One hundred copies of testimony have already been printed for the use of the Committee on Appropriations.

As the subject is one upon which it is the purpose of the committee to allow the broadest debate, it has been deemed wise that the House be put in possession of all the information that is now in possession of the committee, the matter being already in print, but not in sufficient quantity, or rather edition, to allow general distribution among members of the House. Hence, the matter being already in print and a part of our report, and as the expense of this proposed printing will be limited, we ask that these 2,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the House.

While on the floor, I desire to give notice that it is my purpose to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal, to ask for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania—if he made any statement on this point I failed to hear it—how this evidence came to be taken. Was there a hearing ordered by the House?

Mr. BINGHAM. The appropriations for the Civil Service Commission constitute a part of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. So I understand.

Mr. BINGHAM. In the examinations before the subcommittee on appropriations, the testimony of all the heads of the different bureaus of the Government, so far as an examination might throw light upon the provisions of the bill, has been taken. This that I am asking to have printed for the use of the House is simply a part of such testimony.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does it embrace anything besides the testimony or the statements of the chiefs of divisions?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not fully understand the gentleman's question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does it embrace any other testimony taken before the committee, or only the reports of the commission or the members of it?

Mr. BINGHAM. It embraces all the testimony before the committee, together with all the replies to inquiries of the committee with reference to the points upon which the members of the committee desired information as to the labors and work of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is it confined to such portions of the investigation as will throw light upon the subjects which will come up here for discussion?

Mr. BINGHAM. This resolution covers about 200 pages of matter already in type. One hundred copies having been printed for the use of the committee, we want the House also to be in possession of this testimony.

Mr. BAILEY. As this matter is already in type, the cost of course will be trifling, and if it were the purpose of the committee to recommend legislation upon the subject, I would think it entirely proper to print this testimony; but as it seems to be the intention of the committee merely to allow the broadest latitude of debate, without any legislation on the subject, it seems to me that this printing may be a waste of money. But I suppose the House and the country would like to know all that can be known about this colossal humbug. I will interpose no objection to the printing.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to the estimated cost of this work.

Mr. BINGHAM. We have telegraphed to the Public Printer for an estimate. This matter is already in type, and this proposition is simply for an additional number of copies. The small number already printed would not suffice to satisfy members of the House, much less the press of the country.

Mr. PERKINS. You propose to print 2,000 copies——

Mr. BINGHAM. Which would give about 6 copies to each member.

Mr. PERKINS. I understand this would be a document of about 200 pages; and the question with me is whether the cost would exceed the legal limit.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am very sure that the expense will not even approximate $500. I hope the gentleman will not interpose objection.

Mr. PERKINS. I will not.

Mr. MOODY. Does the resolution cover certain matters brought before the committee which are not yet in print?

Mr. BINGHAM. It does.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the deficiency appropriation bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4752) making appropriations to provide for certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this bill covers three items of deficiency for the current year. One is an item of $5,000 for the construction of a temporary building at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, which is made necessary by the insecure condition of the present building, which has been condemned, so that they are without a recitation room. The building will be done in about two weeks if this appropriation is made, and it is very urgently recommended by the Secretary.

Another item covers upward of $30,000 for compensation of the temporary employees of this House who were paid during the extraordinary session by resolution. Money appropriated for the current year was utilized by that resolution for the pay of pages, laborers, and post-office messengers.

The other item is for mileage of Senators and Representatives at the present regular session of Congress, the money that ordinarily would have been available at this time having been used to pay the mileage for the extraordinary session. With this statement I ask consent that the bill be considered in the House at this time.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was read.

It was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. RAY of New York. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be, and hereby is, authorized to have printed and bound such documents and papers for the use of the said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by that committee during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The resolution was adopted.

CORRECTION.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have a correction made in the RECORD. On page 67 of the RECORD, in the eighteenth line in the second column, in the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. NORTON, the word "many" has been printed instead of the word "most," which was used by him in addressing the House. I hold in my hand a note of his remarks as furnished me by the reporter immediately after the gentleman had taken his seat, from which I read:

By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made most soldiers either stand upon the rejected roll or commit moral and legal perjury to reach the roll.

Attention was called to this language at the time and afterwards, when the manuscript of what the gentleman had said was submitted to him—and I have that manuscript now in my hand—in which the word "most" was written by the reporter. Some one struck out that word and inserted the word "many." I have consulted with a good many members of the House upon this subject, and I find that everyone to whom I have spoken about it distinctly heard the gentleman use the word "most." I think the correction should be made, in order that the gentleman's remarks may appear in correct form in the permanent RECORD.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that this controversy relative to the word "many" and the word "most" should have arisen between the honorable gentleman from Iowa and myself. There was no occasion for controversy in the beginning, and there is much less occasion for a continuance of such controversy. Upon the occasion referred to by the gentleman I spoke entirely impromptu and without note or preparation. After delivering my speech I was called to the door by a constituent—a pensioner. On my return to the floor I found the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] addressing the House, and as I was about to take my seat I heard these words attributed to me:

By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made most soldiers either stand upon the rejected roll or commit moral and legal perjury to reach the roll.

Thereupon the gentleman from Iowa, after quoting this language, said:

That is the language of the gentleman from Ohio. Will he stand by that?

My answer to that, as I find it in the RECORD, was:

I do, with the exception of one word. I think I used the word "many" for "most."

Then the colloquy proceeded:

Mr. HEPBURN. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the language that I have quoted was the language the gentleman from Ohio used. I have repeated the language that was used by the gentleman without change of a single syllable or word. The gentlemen all around me heard the monstrous statement. No man could be mistaken about it. Words like those will burn themselves into the memories of all honest, patriotic men in an assemblage like this.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman repeat the language he asserts that I used? I could not hear distinctly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I will repeat the language, although it ought to be enough to bring the blush of shame to any man to think that language of this kind could be uttered—perhaps even repeated—on the floor of this House. But I will repeat the gentleman's language. The gentleman said:

"By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made most soldiers"——

Mr. NORTON of Ohio (interrupting). Now, change that word "most" to "many"——

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing)—

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Change the one word "most" to "many," and you will have my exact language—the language I intended to use.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no criticism to make upon the gentlemen who make the stenographic report of these proceedings. I know they are as able men as can be employed, and honorable men with honest intentions, but I do deny that every word that falls from members upon this floor is correctly reported. The gentleman from Iowa seems to have very prompt access to the records, and he reads from them. They are not in my possession or within my reach, and I will thank the gentleman very kindly if, before I take my seat, he will send them to my desk. Meanwhile I say that three times, in connection with his question propounded to me, I have given notice to the House and to the gentleman from Iowa that that was not my word, neither was it the word intended to be used, even though it might have fallen from my lips upon the floor unknown to me.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that ought to have been all that was necessary or could have been demanded in courtesy and fairness to any member on this floor. Twelve long years has the gentleman from Iowa occupied a seat upon the floor of this House and participated in its proceedings, and I venture to assert now, sir, that never, during the whole of these years, a word has fallen from his lips that he has not edited himself before it went into the permanent records of this country.

I venture to say further, that no member upon the floor of this House has ever failed to accord to him the right to make necessary corrections to more clearly express his ideas. There has not been a member who has not accorded him and all who ever occupied a seat upon this floor that right, in dignity and courtesy and fairness, which has always been accorded to the members on this floor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I have no quarrel whatever with the assertion of the gentleman from Ohio of his rights to state, through corrections in the RECORD, that which he intended to say.

But the controversy between the gentleman from Ohio and myself was this: He has insisted, at all times since this matter has commenced, that he did not use the word which he is quoted as using in the RECORD.

Now, if the gentleman says he intended to use the milder word, the word "many," I am content. That will terminate the controversy so far as I am concerned. But his contention has been all along that he used the word he intended to use; and then he went on to accuse me of a monstrous offense, intentionally, of putting into his mouth the word that he did not use for the purpose of taking an unmanly advantage of him. And when he has made the change he did make it would seem from the RECORD as if I had myself been putting up a man of straw to knock down.

I heard the gentleman use the word distinctly. A dozen men around me have told me that he used the word. Gentlemen on his own side of the House have come to me and said that he used that word. Now, if he says that he did not use the word he intended to use that is all that I care for.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Has the gentleman concluded?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. It is strange, indeed, Mr. Speaker, that a man of so much experience upon the floor of this House as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] can not understand plain language when it is published in the RECORD of this body. I told the gentleman then, and the RECORD shows it, that that was the word I had intended to use—the word "many"—and that if I did not use that word, it was an unintentional slip of the tongue.

My record upon this question is clear and clean; and there can be no other possible motive on the part of any man to attack that record except it be a personal assault upon myself, or from motives of a mean, beggarly political character that would insult even a comrade on the floor of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side].

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that my record does not need any vindication with regard to this pension question; and it will be seen in the years to come that that record will be a continuation of my past record in defense of the interests of the old soldiers of this land. [Applause on the Democratic side]. And I say further, sir, that every word uttered in that speech is conclusive of my intent upon that great question. I have not assailed the old soldiers in a line or sentence in any of my utterances, with a line or syllable to which exception could be taken. I have spoken for the old soldier at all times, and I beg such comrades as the gentleman from Iowa to stand by me and put the honest men who stood in the front of the war where they ought to be; give them a chance to get on the roll; take down the barriers that obstruct the way, barriers that the soldier himself can not surmount, and which, if not removed, will do him the injustice of keeping him on the rejected list during the remainder of his life.

I speak passionately and with intensity upon that subject. I have no fault to find with your record, and I want you to find no fault with mine. In August last, before a congregation of veterans, every man of them maimed upon the field, I took occasion to speak of the soldiers' friends who are upon this floor, and the first name that fell from my lips was the honored name of HEPBURN of Iowa. I am sorry for that now, if he has not the courtesy upon this floor to believe the intention of a soldier that stood with him during the war. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I disclaim now, I disclaimed then, that my intent and purpose was to use any such language as that. I disclaim it now. I disclaim it again, and if you put the word "most" in the RECORD, then it is your word and not mine. It becomes your speech and your insult to the soldier, and not my voice and not my speech. I protest against an outrage of that character, and I ask the House that justice may be done me.

If I have been discourteous, I am not aware of it. If by any fault of mine I have offended, the record does not show it. I am standing with veterans upon this floor—men who have been here for years, almost a score of years, some of them—but I want you to understand that although I come young upon this floor, I come with a heart warm and courteous toward you all, and with a hand open and free, and not clinched against my comrades in the field. I come to join you, to join any and all parties and classes of men upon this floor for justice, for right, for equity to the soldier. I have no further word to say. If the gentleman desires to carry this further, then it becomes a matter of personal question between him and me, about which this House and the country at large care nothing, or mighty little at least. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, just what the procedure would be in a matter of this kind. I am still insisting upon the fact that the gentleman used the word and that the RECORD does not correctly report him. I am entirely willing, if that is within the limits of parliamentary usage, that the gentleman should re-form his speech, that he should modify and tone it down, if he chooses, that he should relieve himself from the consequences of a wanton, false insult to his own comrades. I thought this was important, because in debates heretofore, times without number, I had heard gentlemen, in connection with this subject, use the word "many."

So indefinite that there was no possibility, scarcely, for rebuke. This gentleman was the first one to give something like specific quality to that very word. If I understand the figures properly, when he made that charge it was to the effect that the vast number of at least 200,000 of his comrades, of whom he now speaks so kindly, had committed the crime of perjury in order that they might go upon the pension rolls. We have never attempted a rebuke of that kind that I thought should be made, and that is what I endeavored to do; and I submit to gentlemen here that all through the explanatory remarks that he made at the time he still adhered to the spirit of his remarks—to the contention that he was not correctly reported by me; that I had attempted to put a wrong upon him that I disclaim now, and that I know those about me knew to be incorrect. If this is the proper way for this word to be corrected, I want it done in the permanent RECORD.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the gentleman's motion reported.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the permanent RECORD be corrected in accordance with the stenographic reports of the officers of this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the RECORD be corrected by substituting for the printed words—the motion consists in substituting the word "most" for "many," does it not? That is, for the word "many," on page 67, the word "most" be substituted, in accordance with the stenographer's report.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Ohio states that it was his purpose to use the word "many," I am content that the RECORD should stand as it is, and will withdraw my motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman has stated that time and time again.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Allow me one moment, if the gentleman from Iowa will be patient, until I look at part of the RECORD. In reply to you on the day when this question was propounded to me by you, among the explanations given you was this:

> Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Change the word "most" to "many" and you will have my exact language—the language I intended to use.

What will you demand now? I have no concession beyond that that I made to you that day upon the floor of the House; that concession of the intent of the heart, the head, and the impulse that inspired me to make the speech I did. It would be beneath the dignity of a man to crawl at your feet and do more, as you ask now, to repeat them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, that language does not convey the idea. [Expressions of dissent on the Democratic side.] You will remember that my contention was that the gentleman was trying to put a wrong upon me; that he had charged that I had in an unmanly way put words in his mouth that he did not utter. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is my contention. I think I am not hypercritical on this matter. I have been guilty of no offense of that kind. I have been simply insisting all along that he used the word. I contended he did, and he does not deny using that language here. But if you will refer to the whole of the remarks following, you will find that there was an insisting that he did not use the language that I had imputed to him. You will remember the gentleman used this language in that behalf:

> I thought, Mr. Chairman, that the dignity and the ability and the manhood of the gentleman from Iowa gave him sufficient grounds to meet all men in debate upon this floor without manufacturing or insisting upon the use of a word, and that at least when he had the assurance that I had not so pro claimed it.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. The gentleman admitted that he had such assurance?

Mr. HEPBURN. I had not in explicit terms.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. You had in most explicit and most emphatic terms.

Mr. HEPBURN. Not by any manner of means; always words of qualification, and always there has been an attempt in the explanatory language to have a motive imputed to me. A double purpose, a double meaning. The gentleman talks about frankness in this matter, and yet I submit to the House whether he has been either ingenuous or frank, or to the point.

Now, if the gentleman will again explicitly say that he intended to use the word "many," I am content.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me an inquiry? Has the gentleman any memory of an instance in this House, in his long and eventful experience here, wherein the House, by resolution, or vote, or otherwise, has put into the RECORD as the statement of a member that which the member either said he did not make or did not intend to make?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have no recollection of a question of this kind ever having been raised, but I have no doubt that the motion that I have made is entirely within the limits of parliamentary usage.

Mr. McMILLIN. Even supposing that the gentleman has kept himself within those limits, does he not think that it is an extraordinary and a very dangerous proceeding to go to voting into men's mouths words which they disavow any intention of using on this floor?

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman's question is entirely unnecessary. Not only once but oftener I have stated that if the gentleman from Ohio will explicitly say that it was his purpose to use the word "many" instead of the word "most," I shall be content.

A MEMBER. He has said that several times.

Mr. HEPBURN. But I do not want any qualifications with it. I want him to make that statement fairly, and if he does so, I am content.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to make a suggestion with regard to this matter? The whole difficulty seems to arise from the fact that a change is made in the stenographer's report, for, with that change made, the rest of the debate seems to be absolutely out of order and irrelevant. If the word "most" is not printed as having been used originally, then, of course, all the rest of the debate falls to the ground. If it is printed as having been used, then the subsequent debate explains it fully and completely. What we want and ought to have is a record of what took place. Of course there are a great many difficulties about revising the debates for the RECORD. Every member does revise when he sees occasion and when some other member is not concerned; but the best practice would seem to be that where a debate has taken place and another member is concerned, if a speaker desires to change a word the change should be made with the knowledge of the other gentleman who participated in the debate. Unless that rule is observed, we ought to have the reporters' record unchanged. The Chair submits this as, perhaps, a solution of the difficulty. In this case even if the word "most" is printed as it appears in the stenographer's report, the debate goes right on and explains it: but if the word "many" is substituted for "most," then the subsequent debate seems to be irrelevant. That is one of the difficulties arising from not printing the debate as it occurred, whenever there is any dispute.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have never known an instance in proceedings of the House wherein the language used in debate was not subject to change in revision, where that change did not reflect upon some other member.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee understand that where there has been a controversy on a particular point it has been the practice for one member to change the reporter's minutes without the consent of the other member or members concerned in the debate?

Mr. McMILLIN. I readily confess, Mr. Speaker, that this case is unique. There is no precedent for this proceeding, and I hope it will not be made a precedent. It strikes me that the difficulty we are in is this: What did occur between the gentlemen concerning the subject of discussion is printed. It all goes to the country and is all understood, as the debate occurred. Then the gentleman from Iowa comes in and, by a motion, seeks to put into the mouth of the gentleman from Ohio words which that gentleman says he never intended to use and which he thinks he did not use at the time.

The SPEAKER. But that is not the question. The question is what language he did use. [Applause.]

The Chair hopes that there will not be any expression of opinion by members. The Chair has no other purpose than to try to get this matter understood with reference to corrections of the RECORD. It has always seemed to the Chair that when the RECORD was to be corrected and when there was a controversy upon a particular point, either the correction should be made with the consent of the other member or members participating, or should not be made at all. In the latter case, the member who feels aggrieved and desires to change the RECORD has always the right to come to the House and have it changed; but where he changes the stenographer's minutes and prints something else different from what was said, then the subsequent debate will seem to have taken place under an entire misapprehension; which is unfair to the other persons participating in the debate.

Mr. McMILLIN On the other hand, it strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that it is unfair for the House, by a vote, to put into the mouth of a gentleman a sentiment which he says he either never uttered or never intended to utter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Tennessee is mistaken in supposing that the gentleman from Ohio says he never uttered that language. He says he never intended to utter it; and that statement goes into the RECORD. We all know how frequently a wrong word comes to our tongues when we are in the midst of extemporaneous speech, and as long as the changing of any such expression does not affect anybody else the right to correct it ought to be reserved. The only reason for withholding the privilege of making any such correction is when there may arise some such question as the present. The Chair thinks, however, the whole debate in this case explains itself.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. If you will allow me, I will read:

> By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made most soldiers—

Now, if you change the word "most" to "many," it does not change my meaning, but gives the exact meaning I intended:

> By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made many soldiers either stand upon the rejected roll or commit moral and legal perjury to reach the roll.

It was "many" I was trying to get at. That was my very idea.

Mr. HEPBURN. I was unable to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. LACEY. If the word "most" is stricken out and the word "many" inserted, that of course confirms the charge made against my colleague that he has misrepresented the record. I suggest that this matter be sent to the Committee on Printing. The charge made against my colleague might then be withdrawn from the record, and at the same time the speech of the gentleman from Ohio be corrected in the way he intended to deliver it. Thus no injustice would be done to either gentleman. If the matter be sent to the Committee on Printing by unanimous consent, the record can be corrected without doing anybody any injustice.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the matter might as well be settled here, if that is satisfactory to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Very well; I have no objection to that.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I regret the manner in which this question has arisen, and it would all have been obviated if the gentleman from Iowa had accepted the statement of the gentleman from Ohio immediately upon the making of it. The gentleman from Ohio was asked by the gentleman from Iowa the specific question whether he would stand by the words which he had that moment read. The gentleman from Ohio promptly responded, "Change that word 'most' to 'many,' and I do stand by it." Now, it seems to me——

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? Will the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. BAILEY. Allow me to complete my statement. The language of the gentleman from Ohio is:

> I do, with the exception of one word. I think I used the word "many" for "most." I stand by my language in every particular.

Then the gentleman from Iowa, without accepting the disclaimer of the gentleman from Ohio, proceeded to denounce his statement as a "monstrous" one. I think that, with the statement of the gentleman from Ohio that he used "many" instead of "most," the gentleman from Iowa could very well have said, "then I will have no further controversy over the language." But he pursued; he pressed the gentleman from Ohio to the point where, as very properly stated by him, I think, he can not, with proper self-respect, make any other disavowal. So, as far as I am concerned, I prefer to vote upon the resolution to strike out.

Mr. HEPBURN. Right here I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether, of the language that has just been read by the gentleman from Texas, he did not make this correction in his proof:

> I think I used the word "many" for "most."

Is not that a correction?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. HEPBURN. Did you use that word at that time?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I did to you, upon this floor.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have the statement of several gentlemen about me that that language——

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. You have my proof sheets in your hand. Will you send them to my desk?

Mr. PAYNE. I was seated in the chair at the time of this controversy, and I heard the reply of the gentleman from Ohio exactly as the gentleman from Iowa states it. But I have been talking with the stenographer during the last few moments, and he says that he sat near the gentleman from Ohio when he made the reply and that, as he was taking his seat, he did, in a lower tone of voice, add the clause "if you change 'most' to 'many,'" which, I presume, the gentleman from Iowa did not hear, as I did not, sitting in the chair, and as gentlemen sitting around him did not. But the stenographer says that as the gentleman was taking his seat he uttered that clause in a lower tone of voice.

Mr. HEPBURN. Gentlemen are mistaken as to the time when the gentleman from Ohio used that language. Later in the discussion the gentleman said: "Now change that word 'most' to 'many.'" But I had used the word "monstrous" before that time.

Mr. BAILEY. The RECORD does not bear out that assertion. Immediately after the reading, when the gentleman from Iowa said, "That is the language of the gentleman from Ohio; will he stand by that?" promptly the gentleman from Ohio rose and responded, "I do, with the exception of one word."

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir; but there he stopped.

Mr. BAILEY (continuing the reading). "I think I used the word 'many' for 'most.'"

Mr. HEPBURN. That language was not used at that time.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, inasmuch as this is controverted, I call for the reading of the reporter's notes.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I think this can be easily settled. I will stand by the stenographer's notes, with the exact corrections made in violet ink. If he has them, let him produce them.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have only that that I have read.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. And I say that there was but that one change made, of "most" to "many," as I disclaimed it upon the floor and so advised you three consecutive times, twice asking you to change it and the second time telling you that that was the language that I intended to use. More concessions than that you will not get from me, because I will not violate the truth to please this House nor any individual member upon this floor. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I am glad of that evidence of reformation.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, while we are waiting for the notes will the gentleman allow me a word?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GROW. Of course it has always been customary for members to correct the notes of their speeches; but so far as my knowledge goes, when words spoken involve a controversy between a member on the floor and others the words used must stand. Otherwise personal controversies never would be presented in their true light, as the Speaker well stated. The word "most" in this case, if it were used, and if it be left in the RECORD, is all explained by the discussion afterwards. If the word "most" is stricken out, the discussion appears nonsensical. The noted Pryor-Potter duel resulted from the correction of a word in the notes of the reporter without the knowledge of the other party.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to suggest to him that I hope the analogy of that will not be carried out in this case. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROW. I am not dealing with analogies. I only state a fact of history, and leave the gentleman to make his own analogy. But all I desired to say was that while members have, by courtesy and universal custom, the correcting of their notes to fit exactly the idea that they desired to express, it could not be allowed for each member to change particular words on which a debate hinges. If it could be allowed, then half of our debates would be nonsense. The retention of the word "most" in this case can do the member no harm, for the discussion after the word explains it; but without it the discussion would amount to nothing.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that we are waiting for certain notes of the reporter, and recognizes the gentleman, subject to that.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, if the House will indulge me a moment, I will make a few remarks upon the RECORD as it is. I take it that it is correct. Of course, if not, then these remarks will be on rather a poor foundation.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is whether the the word "many" in the RECORD shall be stricken out and the word "most" substituted, in accordance with the reporter's notes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I believe, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has well suggested, that this controversy may be determined properly by the RECORD itself. I am assuming that it is correct. Now, let us read again from the colloquy between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. I believe that of itself ought to be decisive of this matter. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] had addressed the House upon the theory that the old soldiers, of whom he is one, are not properly treated under the law and by the regulations of the Pension Office. The whole scope and purpose of his remarks had been to claim more for the soldiers and to utter denunciations against those who, in his judgment, had not done and are not doing enough for them. In the course of his remarks, in an impassioned burst of eloquence, he made use of the sentence about which occurs this dispute as to whether he used the word "most" or the word "many."

He was not assailing the old soldiers or charging anything against them. He was not endeavoring, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has stated already, to use any expressions in condemnation of them. After the conclusion of his remarks, when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] addressed the House, he read a sentence which he understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] to have used. Just at that point the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON], who had been absent from the Chamber, reentered it, at the very moment when the gentleman from Iowa was reading the sentence which he criticised. He was reading this. I quote now from the RECORD, page 70; and it seems to me that this ought to be conclusive of the whole matter. I quote from the language of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who was quoting the expression as he understood it to have been used by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON]. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] said, quoting:

"By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made most soldiers either stand upon the rejected roll or commit moral and legal perjury to reach the roll."

That is the language of the gentleman from Ohio. Will he stand by that?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I do, with the exception of one word. I think I used the word "many" for "most." I stand by my language in every particular. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the language that I have quoted was the language the gentleman from Ohio used. I have repeated the language that was used by the gentleman without change of a single syllable or word. The gentlemen all around me heard the monstrous statement. No man could be mistaken about it. Words like those will burn themselves into the memories of all honest, patriotic men in an assemblage like this.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman repeat the language he asserts that I used? I could not hear distinctly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I will repeat the language, although it ought to be enough to bring the blush of shame to any man to think that language of this kind could be uttered—perhaps even repeated—on the floor of this House. But I will repeat the gentleman's language. The gentleman said:

"By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made most soldiers"——

Mr. NORTON of Ohio (interrupting). Now, change that word "most" to "many"——

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing)—

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Change the one word "most" to "many," and you will have my exact language—the language I intended to use.

Mr. HEPBURN. Ah, but "most" was the word you used. We have been familiar with the word "many," used in that connection, during a long period of years. You were the first one, to my knowledge, that specified approximately the number of perjuries committed by your old comrades in order to get the pension or to get upon the rolls. I do not wonder, sir, that the gentleman tries to get away from the consequences of his own rash statement.

There, Mr. Speaker, is the dialogue upon this point. There are the first words, according to this RECORD, uttered by the gentleman from Ohio after his attention was called to this word "most" and this word "many." There is a disavowal, distinct and incapable of misunderstanding, of an intention to use the word "most" and a declaration of the intention to use the word "many."

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me just here?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, if you will read the conclusion of the first paragraph of the next column, in Mr. NORTON'S rejoinder, you will find how erroneous your conclusion is.

Mr. DE ARMOND. One moment; I am just coming to that. Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, this was the first remark upon that word. The gentleman from Iowa commented upon the sentence used, as he understood it, by the gentleman from Ohio, the offensive word being the word "most." The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON], being absent from the Chamber when the gentleman from Iowa took the floor and entering just at the moment that the gentleman from Iowa read this particular sentence, at once disavowed the use of the word or intending to use it; and he did it without the slightest particle or grain of offense to anyone. His attention is directed to the matter. The gentleman from Iowa, after quoting the language, says:

That is the language of the gentleman from Ohio, will he stand by that?

A direct appeal to him. Here is the reply:

I do, with the exception of one word. I think I used the word "many" for "most." I stand by my language in every particular.

Then Mr. HEPBURN proceeded with the denunciation, notwithstanding the disavowal. Mr. NORTON of Ohio again remarked:

Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

He does allow it.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman repeat the language he asserts that I used? I could not hear distinctly.

Then comes this:

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I will repeat the language, although it ought to be enough to bring the blush of shame to any man to think that language of this kind could be uttered—perhaps even repeated—on the floor of this House. But I will repeat the gentleman's language.

And it is repeated. Then comes this, again, from Mr. NORTON of Ohio:

Change the word "most" to "many" and you will have my exact language—the language I intended to use.

And yet there seems to be occasion for correcting the RECORD! There seems to be occasion yet for putting into the RECORD the word "most," so that the gentleman from Ohio will be confronted by the record of his own speech, as it will stand in the permanent RECORD of this House, with the word "most" forced into it, after he disavows it, after he says he did not intend to use it and does not think he did use it!

The gentleman from Iowa says that the gentleman from Ohio used language offensive to him after the gentleman from Ohio again took the floor. But, let me say, the first thing that the gentleman from Ohio did was to disavow this word "most;" and the gentleman from Iowa repeats the language, and then goes on to charge that it is a monstrous utterance, an utterance which he insists was made, though the other gentleman has disavowed it. And after that, after the gentleman from Ohio again, without offensive language, without going into the motives of the gentleman from Iowa, without imputing any policy or trying to do anything toward him that is not creditable, but simply confining himself to the issue, again said he used or intended to use the word "many" and not the word "most," the gentleman from Iowa says:

Ah, but "most" was the word you used. We have been familiar with the word "many," used in that connection, during a long period of years. You were the first one to my knowledge that specified approximately the number of perjuries committed by your old comrades in order to get the pension or to get upon the rolls. I do not wonder, sir, that the gentleman tries to get away from the consequences of his own rash statement.

Here is a record, Mr. Speaker, without parallel in this House, without parallel in any legislative body upon the face of the earth. Here, for reasons, I know not what, and I care not what, there is an attempt to hold a fellow-member upon this floor to the use of a word which he disavows, and disavows promptly, disavows respectfully, disavows decorously, and to force it into the RECORD whether he will or not. There is a refusal to accept his statements; there is a charge upon him of having uttered a monstrous thing, when he says he did not utter it or did not mean to utter it; and then there is a repetition of the same charge in a different form, and there is a sneering suggestion that no wonder he is trying to get away from a disgraceful utterance.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit me right here?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman from Missouri has had much to say about the "disavowal" of the gentleman from Ohio. Now, will he kindly state, from his knowledge of the RECORD, what that disavowal was—whether it was that the gentleman did not use the word "most" or that he did not intend to use it? Because, in the further progress of this debate, the character of that disavowal may have some importance.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, of course I do not pretend to give the exact language used; but my attention was directed to the gentlemen when the controversy arose between them. I was where I think I could hear what they said, and, according to the best of my recollection, the colloquy between them is correctly given in the RECORD.

I do not undertake to repeat the language of the gentleman from Ohio, but I understood him to say, in substance, that he did not think he had used the word "most," and that he knew he had not intended to use it. That is the substance, the nub of it—a disavowal not necessarily confined narrowly to the question whether or not that word slipped from his tongue unwittingly, but a prompt, manly, bold disavowal, and a respectful one, respectful to the House, to the gentleman from Iowa, to the old comrades of both, and to the country; at once a positive declaration that no such word was expressive of his thought and that no such word was intended to be used. There was also his statement that he believed he used no such word.

Now, what is the difference whether he did or did not use the word? What difference does it make whether that word did slip from his tongue without his mind or his heart suggesting it or consenting to it, or whether it did not? He at once, at the first opportunity, interrupting the gentleman from Iowa in order to get the opportunity, disavows the word and proclaims to the House in respectful language that the word attributed to him does not properly express his thought, that he did not intentionally use it, and that so far as he knows he did not use it; that he stands by his general utterance, only substituting the word "many," which he had intended to use, for the word "most," which he had not intended to use. Why ought not that to have put an end to the controversy at that point? Why the necessity for charging that the gentleman's disavowal lacked frankness, lacked honesty? Why the necessity or the propriety of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Iowa in regard to that disavowal? When he said:

Ah, but "most" was the word you used. We have been familiar with the word "many," used in that connection, during a long period of years. You were the first one, to my knowledge, that specified approximately the number of perjuries committed by your old comrades in order to get the pension or to get upon the rolls. I do not wonder, sir, that the gentleman tries to get away from the consequences of his own rash statement—it was not the statement of the gentleman from Ohio if he did not intend to make it. It was not the statement of the gentleman from Ohio if the word "most" dropped unbidden from his lips, and if "many" was the word he intended to utter.

That statement having been made, and the whole context of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio showing clearly that his purpose was not to denounce his soldier comrades, but to denounce the law and the practices under the law which he condemned, I say that no reasonable man upon this floor or in this country, with the context before him, if he will calmly and dispassionately consider the matter, if he will allow prejudice to be laid aside, can doubt that the gentleman from Ohio meant to praise the soldiers and to denounce the law and the practices under it. Now, that being the gentleman's purpose, who can doubt that "many" was the word which he used or intended to use, and that "most" was not the word which he intended to use, even though it may have inadvertently slipped from his lips?

But, Mr. Speaker, it is suggested that "most" ought to go into the permanent RECORD, there to stand while time shall last as part and parcel of the utterances of this soldier from Ohio respecting the soldiers by whose side he fought. And why? Because it expresses his thought? Because he stands by it? Because he defends it, asserts it? No. He at once disavowed the expression. He at once said that "many" expressed his idea and that "most" did not express his idea. But it is suggested that "most" should go into the permanent RECORD for another reason—in order that a foundation may be afforded for the speech of the gentleman from Iowa! Ah, Mr. Speaker, let us understand the issue clearly, if this issue is to be presented. The gentleman from Ohio did everything that mortal man could do in honor and in decency to disavow the thought attributed to him; did it promptly; did it in a most courteous way; did it openly, boldly, and frankly, at the first opportunity. He had a right to do what he did. It is his right that "many," if it expresses his thought, shall go into the RECORD, and not "most." The best reason that has been suggested why "most," which did not express his thought, should go into the RECORD instead of "many," which did express his thought, is that it would serve as a basis for the remarks made by the gentleman from Iowa; but the gentleman from Iowa could have promptly accepted the statement of his soldier comrade from Ohio, although of a different political party, and have allowed the matter to drop.

There was the caustic and effective denunciation which was made upon the theory that the word had been used which the gentleman disavowed. It was not necessary to add to it. While considering amenities to old soldiers among old soldiers, it was not necessary to refuse to recognize the statement of the gentleman from Ohio as the statement of a soldier and a gentleman. It was not necessary to insist, as the gentleman from Iowa did and does (and thereby hangs all the tale that we have here to-day), "most was the word you used." Suppose it was. We have the declaration of the gentleman that he did not mean to use it, that "most" does not convey his meaning.

How often in this House in times past, while you, sir, and your predecessors have presided here, and while various gentlemen have presided in the Committee of the Whole—how often, over and over again, when a statement has been made by a gentleman on this floor, as to calling for a division, calling for yeas and nays, or in regard to any other matter then pending—how often have you and your predecessors, and officers presiding in Committee of the Whole under your appointment, said, when such a statement has been made, "Since the gentleman so states, the Chair accepts his statement"? Such a statement among men supposed to be men of honor and honesty of a fact residing peculiarly within a man's own knowledge and information, a fact as peculiarly his own as his own thoughts or intentions—such a statement, when supported by the whole context of the proceeding, will either "go" in this instance or this will be the first instance in the history of the proceedings of this House or of parliamentary bodies among civilized men when such a statement does not go.

The trouble, Mr. Speaker, is that somehow my able friend from Iowa—exceedingly able he is, too—got upon a hot trail after the gentleman from Ohio—I know not why, I care not why—and his zeal overrunning his discretion, was unwilling promptly to accept a statement such as has been always accepted in this House heretofore, with no reason for the exception now. The gentleman from Iowa proceeded to goad the gentleman from Ohio—proceeded to insist that "most" should be there instead of "many;" and then he asks me to read some remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio in reply to him. The remarks of the gentleman from Ohio when he rose and replied, after his statement had been disregarded, after his statement had been treated as though it were not true, after somebody had assumed to know more about what he thought or intended to say than he knew himself, were caustic. And the occasion justified them. If they had been far more caustic they would have been far more appropriate. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

This question is an extraordinary one, and it is worth while to settle it right. Let us understand the effect of what we do. If we put the word "most" into that permanent RECORD, we put it there against the prompt disavowal of the man who is charged with uttering it; we put it there in violation of all the traditions and practices of this House; we put it there in violation of all the principles that obtain among gentlemen; we put it there, as has been suggested, to afford a basis for the remarks made by the gentleman from Iowa; or we put it there for some purpose not yet avowed. In view of the traditions of this body, in view of the practices prevailing everywhere among gentlemen, to take a gentleman's word as to what were his own intentions, I believe, if we respect such traditions and practices in this case, we will not tamper with this record.

It will not do to say, "Put in the word 'most' and let the gentleman from Ohio, with the word 'most' put in his mouth, with the word 'most' put into his record, upon no better ground than that it may have slipped from his tongue" (if that be the fact—I do not know anything about it), "let the word 'most' go into the RECORD, and then let the gentleman carry with him the subsequent proceedings here to-day to track down that word." Is that charity? Is that fair treatment? Is that in accordance with the ordinary decency which obtains among gentlemen or among legislators upon an equal footing? That would be a fine example for the country! Then any man, actuated by malevolent purposes, who might desire to injure the gentleman from Ohio, could read that word "most," could emphasize that word, out of connection with the context; and then, the calumny having been circulated, the wrong done, the gentleman from Ohio may follow the calumny as fast as he is able, and run it down with the truth which appears in the transactions of the day when these speeches were made and here to-day!

There was no foundation for a subsequent speech on this question. There was no foundation in the practices of this House, there was no foundation in that which should obtain among legislative gentlemen here, for a speech on the subject of this word "most" or upon this sentence, after the colloquy between the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Iowa. And the purpose now is—I was surprised to hear it suggested by the venerable ex-Speaker, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW]—the purpose now is to put into the permanent RECORD, to carry down into history, a word promptly disavowed by the gentleman from Ohio, a word which he evidently did not mean to use if he did unwittingly use it; because, forsooth, the remarks made subsequently to his explanation and subsequently to his disavowal will not have sufficient basis unless that word "most" is put into the RECORD.

That is a statesmanlike reason; that is a reason to be recognized among gentlemen for the doing of a wrong, a lasting wrong, an inexcusable wrong, to a fellow-member! Why, sir, the offense of the gentleman from Ohio, if he had used that word intentionally and stood by it, would have been the offense of slandering his own comrades in arms; and yet here he is, a man who bore arms in the civil war—a man who has the honorable record of an honorable soldier! How marvelous a spectacle that such a man should be threatened here with the making of a record against him which would be as false as false ever was, as false as anything this side of the very gates of hell—false in spirit and in fact, according to the practice of this House!

Whether he used the word in question or not I do not know and do not care; it is not pertinent. The gentleman from Ohio immediately disavowed the intention to use the word, even if he had used it, and therefore I neither know nor care whether he used it on the first occasion or not. Certain it is that the moment his attention was called to it he promptly disavowed the intention to use it. And he certainly did not intend to use it. Where, then, Mr. Speaker, in decency, in courtesy, under the precedents, in honor, is the propriety of forcing upon him and placing in the permanent RECORD a word that he has so absolutely disavowed? Is this old soldier himself to be made a prominent subject for attack, or are you to attempt to destroy him for no more reason than has been suggested here?

I can not believe, sir, that the House will make such a record as that we are asked to make by putting into the mouth of the gentleman from Ohio a word that he has disavowed openly, boldly, courteously, from the very first moment when his attention was called to it. When the matter came to his knowledge, the charge that he had used the word in question, the House knows how promptly he disclaimed the intenton of using it.

But I say again, sir, in order that there may be no mistake in the issue presented here, I say again that I do not care even to read what the gentleman from Ohio said later in response to the gentleman from Iowa. It is not a matter of consequence.

He responded in a courteous manner that he did not think he used the word and did not intend to do so. But the gentleman from Iowa was unwilling to accept the statement that disavowed the use of the word, but spurned, contemned, and threw aside the utterance of the gentleman from Ohio and his explanation—an explanation that could have given no offense to the gentleman from Iowa or to any other gentleman. Let there be no misunderstanding or confusion, then, in the minds of gentlemen here, that the remarks to which the gentleman from Iowa now takes exception were made before the provocation was given by him to the gentleman from Ohio. That language was used afterwards, as the RECORD shows.

The colloquy I have read from the RECORD is a complete disavowal of the use of the word; and it is unprecedented in the history of parliamentary bodies and in the history of this House if you undertake, in view of the disclaimer of the gentleman from Ohio, to force upon him the word "most" in place of "many." Whatever may be the accuracy of the reporter's notes, whatever they show—and but little latitude has been used in the correction here—the gentleman has promptly disavowed his intention to use the word, and that disavowal should stand in an assemblage like this, and in all assemblages of honorable men, as a complete and satisfactory explanation of the accidental use of the word, if uttered.

I hope, I may remark, that this matter will not be thrust aside. I agree most heartily with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] that it ought to be disposed of now, and not shoved off upon any committee of the House. If you are to put the word "most" in the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, let it be done now, in the light of day, with all the facts fresh in our memory. If, notwithstanding the gentleman's disclaimer, you insist that this word shall be put in, let it be done now, and the matter cleared up at once. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have read that part of the notes of the Official Reporter to which attention has been called. They are the same, the Chair will state, that appear in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I do, with the exception of one word. I think I used the word "many" for "most." I stand by my language in every particular. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this controversy has an importance beyond the present question. It makes a good deal of difference to every member of this body whether, after a debate is had on a particular thing, or with reference to the use of particular language, the member using that language can then correct the official notes and change the words, making them express an entirely different meaning, leaving a part out or adding another part, and thus makes the member who called attention to the language appear ridiculous.

Now, the language to which attention was called by the gentleman from Iowa was used by the gentleman from Ohio. I have no doubt of that, for I, in common with many other members, heard the language. I was giving attention to it at the time, and was struck by the sweeping charge made by the use of the word "most." I have not any doubt but that he used the language. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] took the precaution to get the reporter's minutes and get the exact language that had been used by the gentleman from Ohio, and then read it and asked him if he stood by that statement. I noticed the gentleman from Ohio as he took the floor to reply to that question, because there was a personal controversy, and being in the chair, I did not know how soon I might be called upon to interfere between the two gentlemen in reference to a point of order. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] did state that "with the change of a single word"—that is all I heard of that sentence. I supposed that was all he said. I am confident that is all the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] heard in regard to that answer; but I am told by the reporter, who stood within a few feet of him, that he added these words that have just been read by the Speaker and appear in the reporter's notes.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] evidently replied with reference to the response to the gentleman from Ohio as he understood it, that with the change of a single word he stood by that language. That gave force and effect to the reply of the gentleman from Iowa. The gentleman from Iowa went on and commented upon the language as originally used, and we all agree that the comments of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] used that language, were exactly just and right. Now, this is not a partisan controversy. There is no chance for partisan heat. There is no use in talking about falsifying the RECORD, as my friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] has just said.

Why, if there is any falsification of the RECORD, who has done it? It is not the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] who is falsifying the RECORD. It is not his motion that is falsifying the RECORD. The RECORD is not in accordance with the reporter's notes. It is not in accordance with the gentleman's language as uttered upon the floor, although I believe it is in accordance with what the gentleman intended to utter when he was upon the floor in the heat of his speech. If there is any falsification, the falsification was done in changing the word "most" to "many" in the reporter's notes and putting it so in the RECORD. What the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] desires to have done is to have the language appear exactly as it was used on the floor of the House. Does this do injustice to anyone? Does it do injustice to the gentleman from Ohio? Why, he has had the advantage of his full explanation, for he has said in the course of the debate that he intended to use the word "many" and not the word "most." He has the advantage of that in the RECORD, and he also has the advantage of this further language, which he used in connection with this matter:

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am not only surprised, but pained as well, by the language of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. I had learned to admire and respect him upon the floor of this House, learned to admire and respect him before I came upon the floor of this House; but I did not know then that there was any man upon the floor of this House who would insist upon putting words into the mouth of any member upon this floor for the paltry, mean, and despicable purpose of getting something upon which to base a reply. I thought, Mr. Chairman, that the dignity and the ability and the manhood of the gentleman from Iowa gave him sufficient grounds to meet all men in debate upon this floor without manufacturing or insisting upon the use of a word, and that at least when he had the assurance that I had not so proclaimed it.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. That is it exactly.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, there is nothing in that sentence that indicates that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] had used a word he did not mean to use. That sentence asserts that the gentleman from Iowa had manufactured a word and had put it into his mouth, which he did not use. How does that leave the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] if you let the RECORD stand as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] has fixed it? Why, it appears in the permanent RECORD that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] had used the word "many" in his original remarks. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] had obtained the reporter's notes, where the word "most" appeared, and after he had told the gentleman that he had the notes of the reporter and that that was the language used, and had talked about that language, then the gentleman from Ohio comes in and accuses the gentleman from Iowa of manufacturing a word and putting it into his mouth. If the RECORD stands as it does to-day, with the word "many" instead of the word "most," the word actually used by the gentleman from Ohio, then the gentleman from Iowa stands convicted of manufacturing a word and putting it into the mouth of the gentleman from Ohio, exactly as the gentleman from Ohio said in the heat of his reply.

Now, it is not fair, it is not right, it is not honest between man and man. What does the gentleman from Iowa offer this morning? He comes here and says if the gentleman will again stand upon the floor and address the Chair in the presence of the House and say to the House that he intended to use the word "many" instead of the word "most" that he will withdraw this resolution and let it go upon the RECORD in that shape.

Now, justice should be done. If the gentleman from Ohio stands upon his pride and says that he will not say that he intended to use the word "many" and not the word "most," then this House ought, by a unanimous vote, to put into the RECORD just what the gentleman said, and put the word "most" in place of the word "many." [Applause on the Republican side.] There is nothing of partisanship in this matter.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. For information. I have a vague impression that some time during the last two years the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has changed the RECORD, and when an effort was made to put back the words he actually used his side voted unanimously against doing it. Am I correct?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not recollect, or have any such impression as that. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] But I do recollect that when a gentleman upon the other side of the Chamber had taken some liberties with the notes of the reporter, and had changed the RECORD, and when the chairman of the Committee on Printing, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS], sought to have the RECORD express exactly what was said and done, I offered a resolution, if I mistake not, to put into the RECORD exactly what was said and done; and that was done. And the next morning the gentleman whose speech had been corrected said that he had the reporter's notes and changes made in my own remarks and in my own handwriting, and he moved it be corrected. I believe he moved to correct the spelling of one word.

He moved to place a comma instead of a semicolon, and a few other important changes of that kind [laughter]; and then he bitterly complained of the use of one word; and after he had made his speech he withdrew his resolution. I went to the reporter and asked him to show me the notes which he had furnished the gentleman sitting upon the other side of the Chamber, to see what corrections had been made; and the reporter told me that the changes were made in his own handwriting and not mine. [Applause on the Republican side.] Is that the occasion to which the gentleman from Texas alludes?

Mr. BAILEY. It is not. My impression is that a vote was taken and the Republican side unanimously voted against striking out the word which the gentleman had not used and to insert the word that he did use. That is the kind of transaction to which I referred.

Mr. PAYNE. The correction was made in the remarks of the gentleman on the other side of the House.

Now, this RECORD ought to express the truth, Mr. Speaker, and ought to express the truth from beginning to end. It is the record of our debates, and it should be the record of what we say. Of course, gentlemen sometimes make ungrammatical remarks; or if the reporters do not catch them exactly right, they ought to be corrected. The RECORD of the Congress of the United States ought to be grammatical and words correctly used as nearly as it can be done by the average intelligent gentlemen sent from the respective districts. [Laughter.] That ought to be so in all cases. But where there seems to be any controversy over the use of a word, and debate is had upon it, why, then, that word ought to be retained in the permanent RECORD in order to express the truth; and unless it is the wish of the House to tamper with the RECORD, we will adopt the motion offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, we come here from all parts of the country. We represent the American people, no matter what political party we represent. Now, I submit that one of the first things to be done in a body of this kind is to be fair—fair to the Speaker, fair to each other, and fair to the country. Now, then, a witness in court, who has testified under oath, may be recalled to correct any statement that he has made. Shall we not show the same courtesy to a fellow-member when he disclaims the use of a word or the intent to use a word? I submit that a mere statement of the case shows that his wish should be complied with when he says that he intended to use the word "many" instead of the word "most." Why should there be any higgling over that? I think we should accept his statement as gentlemen, as members of this House, and not attempt to fasten upon him the use of a word when he disclaims having used it or having intended to use it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee was recognized. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from Iowa had the floor?

Mr. HEPBURN. I had the floor, but I am perfectly willing to yield it if I can afterwards be recognized.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I had no idea of taking any part in this matter. I was in my place when the gentleman from Ohio stood here and made his speech. I heard all that passed between him and the gentleman from Iowa. I want to call the attention of my friend from Iowa to one fact in this debate that seems to have escaped him. When it commenced the gentleman from Iowa used this language:

> I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] to a remark that fell from him. I think perhaps it was not well considered.

That was what was in the mind of the gentleman then.

> I do not believe that any American citizen will dare to stand in the face of the American people and utter a slander, or libel, or foul aspersion upon the honor of good men, as did the gentleman from Ohio.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is what commenced it. When the gentleman from Iowa proceeded a little further, he said that the gentleman from Ohio had used this language:

> By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made most soldiers either stand upon the rejected roll or commit moral and legal perjury to reach the roll.

That is the language which the gentleman from Iowa imputed to the gentleman from Ohio, and then he asked: "Will he stand by that?" The gentleman from Ohio replied:

> I do, with the exception of one word. I think I used the word "many" for "most."

That is what occurred. There is no doubt about it. Members all around heard it. The Chairman presiding at the time has said that he did not hear that statement, but the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] heard the statement, as his next remarks show.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how a member could disclaim a word or a sentiment any more clearly than the gentleman from Ohio did. The pith of the speech that he was making was not against the old soldier at all; it was against the Pension Bureau and the laws passed with regard to pensions. The very language that he used was:

> By rules of law, by the regulations of your Pension Office, you have made most [or many] soldiers either stand upon the rejected roll or commit moral and legal perjury to reach the roll.

There was no imputation upon the soldier at all. It was an attack upon the law and the methods of administration, and that was followed by a speech by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], showing how liberal the Republican party had been on the pension question. Now, I do hope that this matter can be settled amicably. I really do not see any reason why there should be so much controversy in regard to it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen on that side of the House have sought to convey the impression that this controversy is a matter without consequence, and have attempted to put me in the wrong position of having, for trivial and inconsequential reasons, attempted first to perpetrate an unjust criticism, and then to inflict further injustice upon a member of this House. Two gentlemen have said that even if there was an offense committed by the gentleman from Ohio, it was a matter of little or no consequence; that he was inveighing against the rules and regulations of the Pension Office and the laws of Congress throwing impediments and difficulties in the way of the petitioning soldier, and that that was all that could be found in the language which he had used.

I think those gentlemen have inaptly read the language which the gentleman from Ohio did use. He said that the soldiers were compelled "either to stand upon the rejected roll or to commit moral and legal perjury to get upon the roll." Is that simply a criticism of the pension laws and rules? Ah, no. Back of that criticism lies the charge that most of those who have got upon the roll have got there by traveling through the devious roads of moral and legal perjury. The making of that charge was the offense committed by the gentleman from Ohio. That is the offense that I tried to rebuke. After careful inquiry among members, and being positive myself as to the language that he had used, I stated with some positiveness that he had used the word "most." Then when asked if he would stand by that language he said:

> I do, with the exception of one word. I think I used the word "many" for "most."

That was his first statement. A little further on he said:

> Now change one word, "most" to "many," and you have my exact language.

Then he goes a little further and says:

> The language that I intended to use.

I had made the statement that the gentleman had used certain language. From this rejoinder what am I to understand? That he stands by the language which he thinks he used, or that he intended to use that language? Here are two propositions in this last statement; one that he used the word "many," the other that he intended to use that word. It makes a great difference, in the light of this debate, whether he used the word "many" or whether he merely intended to use it, because further along he becomes more positive. He says:

> I thought, Mr. Chairman, that the dignity and the ability and the manhood of the gentleman from Iowa gave him sufficient grounds to meet all men in debate upon this floor without manufacturing or insisting upon the use of a word, and that at least when he had the assurance that I had not so proclaimed it.

But prior to this there had been no assurance that the gentleman had not "proclaimed" the word "most." This was the first time he denied it. First he said he thought he had used another word; then that he had intended to use another word; and then that he had used another word. Now, which is it? That question is important for me, because, knowing that the gentleman had used the word "most," and that there was no doubt about it, I had made some remarks based upon that idea, whereupon the gentleman accused me of "manufacturing" language for him and of putting words into his mouth for an ignoble and dishonorable purpose.

Mr. CARMACK. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion, I do not understand the language of the gentleman from Ohio to contain an accusation that the gentleman from Iowa manufactured anything. I understand the gentleman from Ohio to put the case in the alternative, either manufacturing a word or insisting that a particular word had been used, when the gentleman from Ohio stated that he had not used that word, as he believed.

Mr. HEPBURN. That does not change the attitude at all, because the gentleman accuses me of either manufacturing or insisting upon his use of that word, although I had an assurance that he had not used it; when, in fact, I had never, up to that time, had that assurance. The gentleman had said that he thought he had used the word "many," and then, further along, he said that the report, with one change, gave his exact language—the language he intended to use.

Mr. CARMACK. That was the gentleman's opinion about it. As I understand, his opinion was that he had used the word "many."

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not sure whether it was his opinion or not. I will quote him exactly:

> Change the one word "most" to "many" and you will have my exact language—the language I intended to use.

Mr. CARMACK. I understand that to mean that it was his opinion that it was his exact language, or that it was at least the language he intended to use. Now, further on, in the last remarks quoted by the gentleman, I do not understand the gentleman from Ohio to charge that the gentleman from Iowa had manufactured a word. He puts that proposition, as I understand, in the alternative. He says the gentleman had manufactured a word, or insisted upon the use of a word. Those are two different propositions.

Mr. HEPBURN. A word which he said he had proclaimed he did not use.

Mr. CARMACK. Yes, he claimed that he did not use it. He quoted what he said was his exact language, or if not, what was certainly the language he intended to use.

Mr. HEPBURN (reading):

Change the word "most" to "many" and you will have my exact language—the language I intended to use.

Now, is there not a difference between those two propositions?

Mr. CARMACK. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. In view of the fact he had made the statement that he had used the words he says further along he had proclaimed he did not use—the words I have read—I think that is a very great difference, and no amount of hairsplitting will change my opinion in regard to that.

Mr. CARMACK. I think the latter remark of the gentleman is somewhat in the nature of "hairsplitting." If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not care to yield further for discussion. I will yield for a question, if the gentleman wishes to put one.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want no injustice done to the gentleman from Ohio. I simply want the RECORD made up so that it will convey the actual facts that transpired here in the House. If the gentleman used that word, I want it in the RECORD. I think it is important. I can not see how any harm can be done him, with the explanations which have been made; yet I can see how, if in the RECORD the word "many" appears, there is a justification given to him for the charge that he makes against me, that I had manufactured a word, or that I had persisted in putting into his mouth a word that he had proclaimed he did not use.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question upon this resolution.

Mr. FLEMING. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that demand for just a moment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. FLEMING. I desire only a few moments.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is suggested all around me that I should not yield.

Mr. FLEMING. I should like to press that request upon the gentleman from Iowa for this reason: I may find myself in the position of having to vote against my party comrades on this issue; and I want to put myself right before the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Speaker, this issue is one of a great deal of importance. It may have bearings in the future which some members perhaps do not fully appreciate now. I know of but one rule for a legislative body to adopt in reference to the record of its proceedings; that is, for the record to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. It is true that the practice of this House has been very liberal in allowing changes in the RECORD. But, Mr. Speaker, every such change in the record of a legislative body is made by sufferance; and whenever the issue is raised, no matter from what side the issue comes, and we are forced to vote, upon what possible principle are we to decide the question, upon what possible principle can all such issues be properly decided, except by ascertaining the facts and letting the record, whenever they are ascertained, speak the facts?

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLEMING. I will do so gladly.

Mr. BAILEY. If it were true that the reporters are infallible—if it were impossible for them to make a mistake—then it might be well for us to adhere to the hard and fast rule that no man has a right to change a word which the reporters record him as having uttered. But while knowing and asserting that the gentlemen who do the stenographic work in this House are as capable in their profession as it is possible for men to be, I know, and every gentleman on this floor knows, that they do sometimes make mistakes, that they have sometimes recorded one word where the member had used another. The difference between the word "most" and "many" is not very great, and when a gentleman declares that he did not use the word which the reporter's notes show, or, if he did, that he did not intend to use it, the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia, it seems to me, does not apply.

Mr. McRAE. Especially when we take in consideration the rapidity with which the gentleman from Ohio spoke.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Did not the gentleman from Ohio disavow the language and correct the RECORD before it was finally made up? I understand he did.

Mr. FLEMING. I am glad the gentleman from Texas has asked his question. I was coming to that point. If I were the censor in this House to pass upon the treatment which members should give to one another upon this floor, I would pass my censure upon the gentleman from Iowa for not accepting in good faith the disavowal made by the gentleman from Ohio.

But that acceptance, or refusal of acceptance, by the gentleman from Iowa is not the question before the House at all. That may be a matter of taste, a matter of manners, or whatever you please. The question which is before the House—the question that is being forced upon us—is, Shall the RECORD of this body speak the truth or shall the RECORD not speak the truth? And it raises the issue of fact.

Now, were there any great difference of opinion in the House as to the question of fact with reference to the word used by the gentleman from Ohio, I would certainly give him and the printed RECORD the benefit of the doubt. But I submit, in all seriousness, that the evidence before the House is almost entirely on one side. The gentleman from Ohio, when challenged about his language at the time he used it, says, "That was the language I used or the language I intended to use." The Official Reporters of the House show that the word "most" was used, and not the word "many." Other gentlemen on the floor within reach of his voice heard the language, and said the word "most" was used, that it fell from the lips of the gentleman, and not the word "many," and even this morning the gentleman from Ohio does not insist that he used the word "many" instead of "most." And I therefore must accept the conclusion that the word "most" was used, and every one else must admit that the evidence in the case is overwhelming that the gentleman did use "most" and not "many."

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FLEMING. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. Speaking of the reporters, we know that their system is composed of what may be called a sign language, to a certain extent. Our reporters are skilled, it is true, in their profession, and are among the best and most efficient. While I am not versed in the science, I understand that frequently one sign is used to represent many words; and is it not possible that the sign used for the words "many" and "most" would be the same or possibly so near the same as to make it difficult to distinguish them apart, and thus lead to the possibility of making such a mistake? Does the gentleman consider that point?

Mr. FLEMING. I think that question, Mr. Speaker, rather injects a new issue into the debate.

Mr. BLAND. Yes; as to whether the reporters are not mistaken as to the word used by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FLEMING (continuing). Because during the entire discussion here up to the time I took the floor I heard no one pretend to maintain that the gentleman from Ohio had really used the word "many" instead of "most." I had understood the gentleman, in view of the force of evidence that has been brought to bear upon the subject by the official records and the statements of members who heard him—I understood the gentleman himself to admit that he must have used the word "most" instead of "many," which he intended to use. But that is not the question at issue. It is not what the gentleman intended to say. That question is not before the House in any case——

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. FLEMING. Certainly.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I understood the gentleman to say that the issue was not what was intended, but what the gentleman from Ohio did actually say. I will ask him whether, when the permanent RECORD is made up as corrected, that speech—the language used by the gentleman—if this correction is put into it as proposed, will represent or express the sentiments of the gentleman from Ohio as he desired to express them?

Mr. FLEMING. It ought——

Mr. DE ARMOND (continuing). Another question, with the consent of the gentleman, before he answers. If the gentleman from Ohio meant to say "many" and actually used the word "most," would the RECORD be a correct record if you stick strictly upon the fact that he used the wrong word and you put in another word that does not express his meaning?

Mr. FLEMING. Well, that is special pleading——

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will you answer the question?

Mr. FLEMING. I will. I will explain in this way: That this RECORD is not simply to include what a man intended to say, but is a reproduction of what he does say. The English language is intended to convey the thought in our minds, and if we fail to convey that thought it is our misfortune.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Then, another question: Suppose the roll were called on this question, and a member intending to vote "no" voted "aye," or one who intended to vote "aye" voted "no" by inadvertence, and asked to make the correction and be placed upon the record as voting as he intended, would it be right to put a man down as voting "aye" who intended to vote "no?"

Mr. FLEMING. If it were an issue that carried importance, it would be proper to let it stand that way. But the question before us is of a very different character. The issue here is what the gentleman from Ohio actually said. The gentleman from Iowa has treated the matter with undue and needless hardship against a soldier and comrade—the gentleman from Ohio. But that is not the issue here.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLEMING. I will, for a question.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. The gentleman will, perhaps, remember—and I mention it in this connection as showing that sometimes mistakes are made by the reporters—that in the extra session I used language accusing the Speaker of having a "brutal" majority behind him, or something to that effect. The reporters got it down a "frugal" majority. [Laughter.] I again rose the next morning to correct the RECORD, and thought I had corrected it, but when the RECORD appeared they called it a "prudent" majority. It took me three days to get the word that I actually used into the RECORD.

Mr. FLEMING. But you finally got it there.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. This shows that sometimes mistakes are made even by the reporters.

Mr. FLEMING. But the gentleman from Kansas finally got into the RECORD the word that he intended to have go there.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. And the Speaker said that the proper place to make the correction was down at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLEMING. I will.

Mr. HANDY. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] has stated on the floor that if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] will say that he intended to use the word "many," in that event the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will withdraw the motion that is pending. I believe that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] has sufficiently indicated his intention to use the word "many." Is not this motion, therefore, pending at this time simply because the gentleman from Iowa wishes to force the gentleman from Ohio to make his declaration in a form to suit the taste of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Speaker, I have already expressed my opinion on that question. I will go further, and say that it seems to me it would be eminently proper at this very stage of the proceedings now for the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his motion.

Several MEMBERS. The gentleman from Iowa. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLEMING. Iowa! For the gentleman from Iowa to withdraw his motion instead of pressing the correction of the journal upon the gentleman from Ohio; but if, for any purpose of his own, which I have no right to control, he forces this House to a vote, there is but one rule for a member of this House to be guided by when we come to make that journal speak, and that is to let it speak the truth. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES. But who is to say what the truth is?

Mr. DE ARMOND. The gentleman just now, in speaking of this matter, suggested that it would be appropriate for the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his motion. He said, "The gentleman from Ohio." Now, ought it not to stand "Ohio?" [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FLEMING. Not a bit of it. When you gentlemen get done now with your applause, I will take some little gratification to myself in saying that I am glad such an illustration happened just at the moment that it did. The stenographer is taking these words as they fall from my lips, just exactly as I speak them. I have no objection whatever to his printing in the RECORD to-morrow morning the precise words that fall from my lips. [Applause.]

Mr. LACEY. Now, let me ask you——

Mr. FLEMING. You will find that I used the word "Ohio," but instantly corrected it and used the word "Iowa." Now, let both of them go down there and they will speak the truth, and I never will ask this House, now or at any time, to change the RECORD for my benefit and make it vary from the truth.

Mr. LACEY. Suppose you took a blue pencil and struck out the word "Ohio." How senseless this applause would have appeared.

Mr. FLEMING. There would have been no explanation of it at all. Mr. Speaker, I repeat it, and I ask my party friends on this side now, who seem to be applauding opposite sentiments, to remember that this is a double-edged sword. Some day a man on the other side of that aisle will say something which you will be glad he said, and which, perhaps, may inure to your benefit and to his detriment, and you will want to hold him to it.

Mr. BRUCKER. We will not take advantage of it.

Mr. FLEMING. And when the motion is made on this side of the House to make the journal contain the words which the gentleman uttered, and which he will want to strike out, you will find this precedent brought up against you and you will be ruled down on it.

A MEMBER (on the Democratic side). They will make a new rule.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Do you not know from your political experience here that whenever that occasion arises the Republicans of this House, with their majority, will strike out anything they want to? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Speaker, I do not take as much satisfaction from the inconsistencies of the Republican party as I do from the consistencies of my own party.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FLEMING. I will.

Mr. HANDY. Do you believe that the day will ever come when the Democratic members of this House will want to force into the mouth of any Republican Representative, for political or any other purposes, a word which, even if he did unwittingly use it, he wishes to disavow? I believe that day will never come. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FLEMING. That is another question of taste, Mr. Speaker, with which I have nothing to do. When a member on that side of the House forces the issue, as the issue is being forced now, there is but one principle for us to be guided by. If our comrade on this side, in the heat of debate, used a word that he did not intend to use, and which he has since disavowed, and some member over there wants to hold him to the record and the issue is forced on me, much as I condemn the spirit in which it is done, I will not forget or sacrifice my own manhood by refusing to vote to let the RECORD speak the truth. There is no other safeguard for any parliamentary body. The country has very little confidence now in this CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that we send out, of speeches we delivered here on the floor in five minutes that it takes five hours sometimes to get through with. [Laughter and applause.] And if you set this precedent of coming in here and by a majority party vote striking out words which fell from lips of members in debate and putting other words in their mouths, you will give it less confidence before the people than it has now.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FLEMING. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. The gentleman wants to stand by the reporter's notes?

Mr. FLEMING. Not alone.

Mr. CARMACK. One thing I want to suggest. In that very discussion words were put into the mouth of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN] which would have taken him over five minutes to utter, and he never uttered a word upon the subject—in that very same debate. Suppose that had not been corrected, would the gentleman want to make the gentleman from Mississippi responsible for all that language? That occurred in that very same debate.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Speaker, my answer to that is very plain, and certainly a simple one to my mind, and that is, I have never said that the Official Reporters' notes were absolute and conclusive evidence to this House of what a member said; but I do say they are prima facie evidence of what that was, and when there is a difference of opinion, and members are present who heard the debate, we can take them and get their evidence against the official notes or in support of the official notes, if we desire to do so. But that is not now before the House. Not one single member has risen to his feet and stated that the official notes were wrong. On the contrary, the gentleman from Ohio himself practically admits that he must have used the word, the word contained in the official notes.

Now, I know it may be intended by some political enemy of my party comrade from Ohio to go on the stump and use to his disadvantage this extract from this speech without giving the proper explanation of it. I wish to say here, sir, that anyone who would do so would deserve the condemnation of all honest people; and any man who attempts to do that on the stump would be followed by the gentleman or some of his friends with a prompt disavowal and a prompt explanation which would certainly overwhelmingly disgrace any such man before any audience that could be trumped up in the State. I will guarantee if you attempted anything of that kind in the State of Georgia the audience would howl down any man who would attempt to use such an unfair advantage in a political discussion.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have made my position sufficiently clear, and I do hope the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw the motion and let it stop where it is. The gentleman from Ohio has disavowed any intent to use the language attributed to him, and I think that ought to be sufficient. But I must say, in conclusion, for the reasons I have just stated, if this is forced to a vote, I shall stand upon the principle I have announced and vote to let this RECORD speak the truth.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask for the previous question.
Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker——
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it proper to offer an amendment to this resolution now?
The SPEAKER. Not when the previous question has been demanded.
Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question.
The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.
The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.
The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.
Mr. BAILEY. Division.
The House divided; and there were—ayes 127, noes 106.
Mr. BAILEY. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.
The yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken; and there were—yeas 138, nays 121, not voting 97; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
To Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, indefinitely, on account of illness in the family.
To Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, indefinitely, on account of sickness in the family.

REPORT OF MANAGERS OF SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Printing.
The report was read, as follows:

Your committee, having had under consideration House concurrent resolution No. 7, to print, in addition to the usual number, 500 copies of the report of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, etc., recommend that the same be agreed to, with the following amendment:
Strike out "House," in the eighth line, and insert "Home."
The Public Printer estimates the cost of the printing under this resolution at $824.

Mr. PERKINS. I call for the reading of the concurrent resolution as it will stand with the amendment.
The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed of the report of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, in addition to the usual number, 500 copies of the report proper, 500 copies of the report of the assistant inspector-general of the State Homes, and 150 copies of the record of members for the use of the Home.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I may be permitted to say before the question for unanimous consent is submitted that this matter is now in type in the Government Printing Office, but under the law there is no authority to furnish copies of the report for the use of the Home, and the object of this resolution is to provide for printing these additional copies for the Home. By a typographical mistake the word "House" was printed in the resolution for the word "Home."
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?
There was no objection.
The amendment was agreed to.
The concurrent resolution as amended was then adopted.
On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was adopted was laid on the table.
The House then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 14, 1897.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. KYLE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN ST. PAUL, MINN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating, in response to a resolution of the 9th instant relative to the changes required in the construction of the post-office, court-house, and custom-house building at St. Paul, Minn., that the matter is now receiving the attention of the Department; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

OCCUPATION OF STREETS, ETC., IN WASHINGTON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, pursuant to the requirements of section 1818 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to the improper appropriation or occupation of the public streets, avenues, squares, or reservations in the city of Washington belonging to the United States, etc., stating that on the 10th day of September, 1897, he transmitted to the Attorney-General the affidavits of citizens of Washington, D. C., calling attention to the fact that the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company had forfeited its rights through nonuser to the tracks laid on New York avenue between Fifth and Seventh streets NW., in that city, and that on the 11th instant he also submitted to the Attorney-General affidavits of citizens of Washington, D. C., complaining of the illegal occupancy by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company of a triangular plat of ground in that city, and in each instance recommending the institution of proper proceedings against the corporation to compel the removal of its tracks from the lands in question as a public nuisance or purpresture; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the establishment of a department of commerce and industry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., praying for an increase in the heavy artillery of the United States Army by the addition of not less than two full regiments; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing a specific appropriation for the maintenance of a branch hydrographic office in that city; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., praying that the money now in process of collection from the overland railway companies be set aside as a fund for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., relative to the value to commerce and industries of the temporary weather bureau station on Mount Tamalpais, California, and praying that it be made a permanent station; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PASCO presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Jacksonville, Fla., praying for the establishment of a department of commerce and industry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of 200 citizens of Owosso, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called Lodge immigration bill, providing for the exclusion of illiterate immigrants; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of 200 citizens of Owosso, Mich., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented memorials of Wilbur L. Wright and 18 other citizens; of J. M. Malambre and 19 other citizens; of Kaufman & Bowers and 19 other citizens; of George Smith and 19 other citizens; of D. Curry and 19 other citizens; of W. T. Darden and 19 other citizens; of E. C. Thompson and 19 other citizens; of Henry Ralph, jr., and 38 other citizens; of D. Curry and 18 other citizens; of C. P. Humphrey and 18 other citizens; of G. W. Cole and 52 other citizens, and of C. H. Maginnis and 74 other citizens, all in the District of Columbia, remonstrating against any change being made in the present system of ticket brokerage; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. WHITE presented a memorial of the Federated Trades Council of Sacramento, Cal., remonstrating against the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 347) providing for the erection of a public building at the city of Tacoma, in the State of Washington, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2770) granting a pension to Belinda D. Beal; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 2771) for the relief of certain enlisted men of the Marine Corps; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2772) for the relief of Daniel Rowan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GORMAN introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 2773) for the relief of Virginia I. Mulian, of Annapolis, Md. (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2774) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of John Clemson and John C. Cookson;

A bill (S. 2775) for the relief of Susan S. Alexander, widow and executrix of George W. Alexander, deceased; and

A bill (S. 2776) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to reexamine and resettle the accounts of certain States and the city of Baltimore growing out of moneys expended by said States and the city of Baltimore for military purposes during the war of 1812.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 2777) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint and confer the rank of first lieutenant of marines upon the leader of the United States Marine Band; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2778) to improve the Severn River, State of Maryland, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GORMAN. In connection with the bill just introduced for the improvement of Annapolis Harbor, I present certain resolutions of the mayor, counselor, and aldermen of the city of Annapolis, with accompanying communications, which I move be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE introduced a bill (S. 2779) establishing additional regulations concerning immigration into the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, I will say just a word with reference to this bill.

At the proper time I shall offer it as a substitute for the bill now pending before the Senate. It does not differ materially from the bill pending except in one feature. It provides that all persons intending to come into the United States shall make their test and pass their examination before the consuls of their respective districts prior to going on board a steamship. I regard it as a hardship, and frequently it would be a very great hardship and inconvenience, that intended immigrants should come across the water and pass their examination only to fail at the port of New York or at another port in this country. Very frequently a person has what is called stage fright, and stage fright is sure to come when a person is called upon to read the Constitution of the United States after having reached the end of that long journey and in fear that he is going to fail. Let them make their tests before the consuls in their respective countries, within a few miles of their own homes.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Immigration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2780) for the relief of Agnes W. Hills and Sarah J. Hills; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAFFERY introduced a bill (S. 2781) to amend section 4440 of the Revised Statutes, authorizing the licensing of mates on river and ocean steamers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2782) for the relief of Charles H. Janney, administrator de bonis non of the estate of Joseph H. Maddox, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 2783) to remove the charge of desertion from the name of Joseph McGraw, of Lincoln, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RAWLINS introduced a bill (S. 2784) to provide for holding terms of court in the district of Utah; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 2785) for the relief of Blanche T. Hunton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2786) granting a pension to Martha E. Huddleston; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present, to accompany the bill, the petition of Mrs. Huddleston, verified by affidavit and supported by the affidavits of G. M. Howell and John L. Paul. I also present a letter from the Record and Pension Office of the War Department giving the military record of her deceased husband. I move that the bill and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2787) granting a pension to Oscar F. Renick; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present, to accompany the bill, Pension Office letters of May 8, 1894, June 23, 1894, and June 30, 1894, and a memorandum, typewritten, signed by Cyrus Bussey, Assistant Secretary of the Interior, in regard to the payments made to Dr. Renick and the pension certificate which was issued to Dr. Renick and afterwards recalled. I move that the bill and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 2788) for the erection of a public building in Reno, Nev.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PRITCHARD introduced a bill (S. 2789) providing for deepening and widening the Pasquotank River and Croatan Sound, in the State of North Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 2790) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of John Haley, alias John Lynch; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present a statement of Mr. Haley in support of the bill and the petition of Marshall S. Rossiter and 49 other citizens and ex-soldiers of Claremont, N. H., praying for the passage of the bill. I move that the bill be referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAFFERY introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 74) authorizing the appropriation of $25,000 out of the unexpended balance of $250,000 appropriated for closing Pass a Loutre Crevasse, in pursuance of an act approved February 26, 1897; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CAFFERY, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the refunding by the Secretary of the Treasury of certain moneys collected by the United States be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims of the Senate, to accompany S. 978, first session Fifty-fifth Congress.

DEATH OF MRS. NANCY ALLISON M'KINLEY.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, all Senators are aware that a great calamity has overtaken the household of the Chief Magistrate of the nation. The funeral of his mother is to take place at about this time. As a token of sympathy and respect for him, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 15, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 14, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, had promised that he would give me notice and allow me a few minutes' time during the consideration of the deficiency bill which passed yesterday and which includes additional mileage for Senators and Representatives. I was absent from the Hall, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, at the time the bill was considered. I had gone there at the instance of my friend from Pennsylvania, General BINGHAM, to get the statistics on the civil service to which he had just referred, and I simply desire to say that I can not under any circumstances accept that money for my personal use on account of the position that I took in the campaign of 1894, after the Democrats had passed a similar measure which I publicly denounced.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 1462. An act granting an increase of pension to Enoch G. Adams—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 496. An act granting a pension to Simpson Everett Stilwell—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 483. An act granting an increase of pension to Caroline B. Bradford—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 1118. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Chamberlin—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 1704. An act to increase the pension of Mrs. Helen A. De Russy—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 484. An act granting an increase of pension to Carlton W. Muzzy—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 486. An act granting a pension to Mary M. Macauley, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Daniel Macauley, United States Volunteers—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 619. An act to increase the pension of William N. Wells—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 1829. An act granting an increase of pension to James H. Kile—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 104. An act to increase the pension of Lucretia C. Waring—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 2117. An act granting a pension to Fannie Kautz, widow of August V. Kautz, late brigadier-general, United States Army—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

CORRECTION.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the RECORD. On page 122 the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is reported to have used this language:

> But the controversy between the gentleman from Ohio and myself was this.

That is not a correct report of what the gentleman said. What the gentleman did say was this:

> But the controversy between the gentleman from Ohio and I was this.

Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that the gentleman from Iowa intended to use the language as it appears in the RECORD, and if he will now state publicly on the floor that it was his intention to say "myself" instead of "I," I shall be content; otherwise I will move that the permanent RECORD be corrected in accordance with the fact. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman I would say that if there is a print of something other than what I said upon the floor, I am not responsible for it, because I expected just some such claptrap as this from some such gentleman [laughter], and therefore, when the manuscript of the reporter was submitted to me yesterday, I refrained from making a single change in it.

Mr. BAILEY. Was any change made in it?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know, sir, whether there was any change made or not. None was made by me, and none to my knowledge, because, as I have said, I was anticipating something of this character. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does the gentleman from Iowa charge that it is claptrap to propose to change the RECORD to correspond with what was said?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; but the purpose of the gentleman from Kentucky is quite apparent to the House, and if I have improperly characterized his motion I will withdraw the objectionable word.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I am not surprised, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Iowa should speak of "claptrap," because he has demonstrated on this floor that he is a past master in the art of claptrapping. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire the deliberation to proceed? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The gentleman from Iowa has indicated that it was his purpose to use the language as it appears in the RECORD, and therefore I will not press my motion.

TRIBUTES TO HON. ASHLEY B. WRIGHT.

Mr. LAWRENCE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Saturday, January 8, 1898, be set apart for paying tribute to the memory of the Hon. ASHLEY B. WRIGHT, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Massachusetts.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BROSIUS. Before that question is put, I should like to make an inquiry of my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] with relation to the time which he proposes to allow for discussion of the clause relating to the civil service.

Mr. BINGHAM. While I hardly think this is the time to enter upon that question, I will state to the gentleman that so far as I am concerned, and so far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, there is a disposition to allow the most unlimited debate within reasonable bounds upon that subject.

Mr. BROSIUS. That is all right.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BINGHAM, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the first or formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit briefly a general statement in connection with this bill, the details of which will be found exhibited in the report.

The estimates which have been submitted by the Departments for the next fiscal year aggregate $22,343,286.65, while the appropriations recommended in this bill amount to $21,562,425.65. The appropriations for the same purposes for the current fiscal year aggregate $21,719,566.90, being $157,141.25 more than is recommended in the present bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899. The total amount recommended in this bill is $780,861 less than the aggregate estimates submitted. The whole number of salaries specifically provided for in this bill is 10,000, being 198 less than the number estimated for and 25 less than the number provided for in the bill for the current year.

As we progress in the consideration of this bill, I will submit to the House an amendment which came to the committee after our report had been sent to the printers. This amendment embraces a reduction which we suggest shall be made in the clerical force of the Pension Office. The Commissioner of Pensions has submitted to us a statement showing that he can adequately meet the responsibilities and labors of his office for the next fiscal year with a reduction of 95 clerks, whose salaries aggregate $115,500. So that the exhibit which should go to the country in connection with this bill, taking into consideration this reduction, should show appropriations aggregating $21,446,925.65, including specific provisions for 9,905 clerks, being a reduction of $896,361 upon the sum total of the estimates and of 293 in the whole number of subordinates specifically estimated for.

As compared with the appropriation act for the current year, this bill, with the amendments which I will submit at the proper time, will make $272,641.25 less and provides for a reduction of 120 in the number of clerks or salaries.

Your committee, in the course of its investigation, consulted with some interest and care a report made to the Fifty-third Congress from the Department of Labor. It covers the number and per cent of employees in the classified service of the United States in Washington receiving from $1,000 to $1,800 per annum.

I am of the opinion that as a general proposition every subordinate officer of this Government in any of the Departments, in fact, throughout the entire work of the Government, is liberally, generously, and perhaps extravagantly compensated for the work which he performs. Certainly, if this remark applies to no other divisions of Government work, it applies forcibly to the Departments of this Government located at Washington. The exhibit I submit, recapitulated for 1893, shows that 10½ per cent of the subordinate force in Washington receive $1,800 each; nearly 13 per cent, $1,600 each; nearly 20 per cent, $1,400 each; 33 per cent, $1,200 each; 16 per cent, $1,000 each. This force numbers to-day, carried in this bill, 9,905 subordinates, instead of 6,532, as shown by the report of 1893, and the appropriation for the support of these subordinates is $21,446,925.65.

I believe that upon a thorough examination of the work of this clerical force in the Departments here and covered by the present bill there could be made, without any injustice, a reduction from one million to one million and a half of dollars. Therefore, in the preparation of this bill, we have deliberately refused our assent to every suggestion from the Departments for increased compensation of the subordinate force, save in the case of one clerk, as will be explained when we come to the appropriate amendment, in which case there has been an increase of $400. The expenditures for the additional force asked for by the respective Departments, together with the increases in compensation which were asked for, would, if conceded, have involved an additional expense of almost $1,000,000. We have given only an increase in one case of $400, but have cut down the force to the extent that the committee believe is practicable to reduce it to at this time.

Gentlemen will observe, on pages 2, 3, and 4 of the report, which is accessible, I believe, and printed for the use of the members of the House—gentlemen will observe that we go into the details as to the changes made in the Departments. We have found running in the Departments a privilege which has been conceded to the heads of the Departments for a long time; that is, for the transfer of any one on the clerical force from one bureau to another, and in the course of time these transfers have become permanent under the operation of the system, and hence, while allowing so much to this or so much to another bureau for clerical service, in effect it is not receiving the allowances pointed out in the appropriation, but the detail is in another bureau, where there is no actual exhibit of the force employed. Last year we adjusted in this respect the Navy Department; this year we have made provision for the Treasury Department, the Post-Office Department, and the State Department (the War Department having been already provided for), and the only one of the Departments which has not yet been taken into consideration is the Interior Department, and we may be able to adjust that before this bill becomes a law.

Gentlemen will find, on pages 4, 5, and 6, by reference to the report, a series of amendments which, under the bill as made up, the House will doubtless approve, because all are in the line of better administration of the Departments. The first, with regard to the Library, will be found on reference to the report, page 4. That amendment I will discuss in detail, should there be any necessity for it, when we come to the paragraphs of the bill. It is sufficiently explanatory now, for the general information of the House, to submit that we have given current law to the administration of the Library work and an increase of $500 to contingent expenses. None of the propositions contained in the report of the Librarian of Congress has been acceded to by the committee.

We have reached the conclusion after careful examination that the current law is ample, and that when Congress, at the last session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, increased the 43 subordinates doing the work in the old Library here in this building, and appropriated $55,000, to 108 subordinates for the new Library, and appropriated $128,000 to them, that it was ample and sufficient. The Library to-day is not exactly in the condition in which we would desire to see it placed; and so far as that is concerned, there has been as yet no broad general scheme submitted where it shall become in the future what Congress desires the great Library of the nation to be.

We have concluded, therefore, that in the present condition of affairs, with no catalogue completed or partially available for the use of students, or all others who may have occasion to visit the Library who are not students, there is ample appropriation given in the bill for the purposes of that establishment as now organized and subject to the rules established and the field of usefulness that it covers.

I call the attention of the committee also to the further fact that the Committee on Appropriations has generally qualified the law and limited the appropriations to the various Departments of the Government where there are maintained libraries in the respective Departments under existing allowances.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of members, because I desire at this time that they shall have an opportunity of examining it, to page 5 of the report, which embodies an elaborate provision which we ask to be incorporated in the law, with reference to the leaves of absence in the various Departments of the Government here in Washington. I invite the attention of gentlemen to the fact that that is an amendment which clearly expresses the intent with which it was framed.

To-day the Departments in Washington grant leaves of absence of thirty days with pay, which is called "vacation absence." It next takes up those cases of sick—sick because of contagious diseases in the family or individually sick—and may allow in such cases an additional thirty days. Besides that, when a case is specially meritorious, it is allowed thirty days more. You will find in the appendix to the report of the committee, on page 24, the correspondence with all of the Departments of the Government, wherein we have asked them to submit to what extent this leave-of-absence privilege has been carried, and the report shows in a table on page 24—and I need not go into details—the extent to which it has been carried.

There seems to have been a lack of care in the administration of this privilege under existing law. There has been a general acceptance, perhaps an unreasonable availing, on the part of subordinate officials of the Government, of the privileges of the law; but all we desire at the present time is to make this limitation of thirty days, as now provided by the law, and thirty days under specific restrictions, in meritorious cases, for the prevalence of obnoxious and contagious diseases in the families of the departmental employees, or where the clerk or subordinate is personally ill.

And as the Government is generous not only in its compensation to its subordinate force, of seven hours of labor, but generous in a thirty-days leave of absence, the twelfth of a year, generous in its recognition of physical distress in family, or disease or inability by sickness on the part of the subordinate to perform work, to the extent of thirty days more, we claim, as was exhibited to us in our every investigation, that the Departments of this Government are behind in their work; and the logical conclusion is that they are behind in their work because of the thirty days' leave of absence, one-twelfth of a year, to the entire subordinate force.

The exhibit will also show an exceedingly large percentage, in some cases running to 60 per cent, of the entire subordinate force of a Department on sick leave during the fiscal year. As a compensation to the Government for its generosity in the administration of the work given to the subordinate force, we call upon the heads of bureaus to make monthly reports and give to the head of a Department the privilege of calling upon the subordinate force of any bureau for work over the seven hours fixed, at the discretion of the Secretary, and without compensation.

Further, we call upon the Departments to make report to the President every quarter, so that the Executive of the Government may have full knowledge as to how the Departments under him are doing their work. We consider that this provision, if rigidly observed and adhered to by the heads of Departments, will in the course of a year bring up the work of almost every bureau, so that in the next fiscal year we can enter upon the consideration of this proposition with a knowledge that the bureaus in the Departments of this Government are even and normal in their condition as to work.

Mr. STEELE. Is it not construed now that employees may have ninety days' leave?

Mr. BINGHAM. Virtually ninety days. They can have that.

There is another matter concerning which we shall ask a change. The provisions of the law are such now that there can be no detail in the Departments here from what is called the general service, as I will illustrate. We discovered that the Post-Office Department had detailed men from the Railway Mail Service. They are not clerks of that Department, and under the statute can not be detailed. We took up in the Post-Office Department the number of clerks that they had detailed, and made it possible for the Department, without injury to its business, either to appoint these men who are there now or others that might be referred to them under the civil-service rules. We make emphatic by amendment a prohibition in the future of a transfer from the general service, either in that Department or in any other Department.

Now, gentlemen, with one or two other amendments, which the committee will submit as they go along, I can safely commend this bill to the good judgment of the House, as we have thoroughly examined the bureaus of the Departments critically, and at the same time are desirous of in no way crippling the public service. The bill presents an exhibit of almost $1,000,000 below the estimate, and a large sum below the current expenses. Instead of increasing the clerical force, we have largely reduced it.

We have refused the increase of any compensation to the subordinate force, believing that under the law as it now exists and under the generous allowances of the various bills of Congress, every subordinate of the Government covered by the details of this bill is amply and generously compensated for his seven or eight hours of daily work during the year, less the annual holidays, six or seven, the thirty days' privilege of absolute recreation on leave, and the larger privilege accorded in cases of contagious disease in family or disease of self, the privilege of thirty days' leave of absence under certificate of physician.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask——

Mr. BINGHAM. I would state to the House now, before reaching the paragraph which pertains to the civil service, as it is a part of this bill, that we allow in that paragraph the provisions of current law. I shall go into no debate now upon the subject beyond this statement, and when we reach that paragraph in the bill, I shall ask the House to pass it over without prejudice and proceed with the consideration of the bill until its conclusion.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he submit at this time a request for unanimous consent that when the committee reaches the paragraph relating to the civil service its consideration under general debate and five-minute debate be postponed until the conclusion of the bill shall have been reached.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will make that request.

Mr. DOCKERY. And determine something about the general debate.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state it is the purpose of the Committee on Appropriations, when we reach that paragraph, to allow the greatest limit of debate and liberality as to time. It is a subject that has engrossed and is engrossing the attention of the House at this time. It is a subject of legitimate debate on the provisions of this bill, and therefore there is no antagonism on the part of the committee to a full, free debate, covering perhaps several days, if it is desired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The purpose, if I understand the gentleman, is that the general debate is to be had as it usually is.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not as it usually is. When that paragraph is reached I shall ask for its postponement until the conclusion of the bill, and then have general debate.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is important to have an understanding in respect to the matter now, because this matter is submitted for unanimous consent, and if objection is made now, of course the debate will have to go on at this time. I concur fully in the views of the gentleman in charge of the bill. The purpose, as well stated by him, is to conclude the undisputed portions of the bill, and then, when we shall have reached the conclusion of the bill, to return to the paragraph relating to the civil service and have general debate and the five-minute debate on that paragraph. Therefore I ask the gentleman to submit his request.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, when we shall have reached the paragraph of the bill that covers the appropriation for the Civil Service Commission, I will ask that it be laid aside or postponed without prejudice until we reach the conclusion of the bill, having covered the preceding paragraphs, and then that we may agree, at that time, upon the length of debate in reference to that paragraph.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania one question, though I think I get his idea. Is it the intention or expectation of the gentleman that this bill shall pass the House before the holiday recess?

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, yes. Should the House determine to take a recess on the coming Saturday, I think that we would have great difficulty to get through this bill, especially that part which relates to the civil service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I understand it is the intention that the House shall adjourn on Saturday, if possible.

Mr. BINGHAM. However, if the time agreed upon should run to the recess, should the House determine to take it on Saturday next, the debate could run over until after the holidays. I want to impress upon the House the fact that there is no objection on the part of the committee to allowing time for debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I understand that. I want to know whether the gentleman expects there will be much debate on the other portions of the bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. Of course we do not know what may arise.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Of course, then, it is difficult to set a day in advance when he expects we will reach the conclusion of the bill, excepting the civil service.

Mr. BINGHAM. To-day, or certainly to-morrow, all the provisions, with the exception of the civil-service provision, ought to be completed.

Mr. BROSIUS. Just one inquiry. I think I understand my friend, and his very frank and candid statement. The debate that he proposes will be general debate.

Mr. BINGHAM. General debate.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit a single suggestion in reference to the recess? Saturday next has been set apart for eulogies. It is the intention of the Committee on Ways and Means to report a concurrent resolution for the holiday recess to commence on Saturday at the close of those eulogies, and hence discussion on this bill would necessarily end on Friday night. I merely make that suggestion in order that gentlemen may measure the time.

Mr. BINGHAM. In view of the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means as to their purpose to submit to the House to-morrow, or whatever day it may be, a resolution for the holiday recess, that the agreement be such that at the recess, if in connection with the general debate on the paragraph covering the Civil Service Commission a time longer than Friday night should be needed, there will be, so far as I am concerned, no objection that the general debate run after we meet again.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That ought to be very satisfactory.

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like to see this bill go through. While I believe this House has not accomplished sufficient in these intervening days, the committees having been organized, and while we should be glad that two of the general appropriation bills should have been gotten out of the way, we recognize a desire that this legislation shall be fully debated, and it will meet with no opposition on my part.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That should be satisfactory to everybody.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that debate be postponed on the civil-service provisions of the bill until the bill is in all other respects completed.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I should not like to give a false impression to the House should I remain silent before this question is submitted. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has already agreed, as I understand it, to allow me twenty minutes to discuss this bill this morning. During that twenty minutes, as I leave this city this afternoon to be gone during the holidays, I may refer in a way to the question of civil service, and I understand, according to this provision, I shall be allowed to occupy my twenty minutes in general discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is objection made to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I do not understand the request.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend for a moment. The request made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that general debate on the paragraph relating to the appropriation for the civil service be postponed until in other respects the bill has been completed.

Mr. BARRETT. I wished the House to hear me before the request is granted, so that there may be no misunderstanding on the matter.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to say that the subject-matter about which this colloquy has taken place is one of a good deal of interest, whether of importance or not; but if the debate proceeds now, naturally members of the House will not be vigilant in their attendance here, knowing that the holiday recess is to come very soon. For myself, I want to make this explanation: I am compelled by an engagement which I can not modify or change to leave the city this afternoon at 3 o'clock, and I think it would be very unfortunate if the House should not have an opportunity to know my views on this question. [Laughter.] I believe that in the long run the time of the House will be saved and the interests of the House better subserved if this bill is not pushed to final passage until after the holidays. The subject is one in the discussion of which the country is now taking a deep interest, and while I do not either contemplate or favor any attack on the appropriation in the bill, I think it is a proper field and a proper occasion for the full discussion of the subject, and I believe that a day or two can be advantageously devoted to that discussion immediately after the holidays.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. BINGHAM. What is the question of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I want to ask, purely for information, if the proposition referred to for leave of absence applies to all the Departments?

Mr. BINGHAM. To all the Departments in Washington.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I had understood that heretofore the rule had not applied to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. BINGHAM. There they have a specific leave under specific law, according to my understanding.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. And they are paid by the Government for the time?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am not positive as to the length of the leave that the employees in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing are allowed, whether it is thirty days or fifteen days, but I will say to the gentleman this provision does not apply to that Bureau.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of my colleague on the committee for a moment. The suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is—and it appeared to meet with a good deal of favor in the committee—that the debate upon this bill should continue until after the holidays. I have no objection to that, because I think a broad debate upon this subject is essential; but it seems to me that if the debate is to continue beyond the holidays, it would be unwise in the extreme to begin it before the holidays, for this reason: After the rest of this bill is disposed of there will be nothing to keep members here, if they can have the privilege of speaking upon this subject indefinitely after the holidays. The result will be that we shall occupy with this debate one or two days before the recess which might be used for other public business. Therefore, if the debate on this subject is to continue beyond the holidays, I think it would be wise to dispose of the rest of the bill and then defer the whole of the debate on this subject until after the holidays.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would say to my colleague, as the result of some experience in the House, when there is a general debate upon any proposition the members specially interested are generally quite anxious to be number one, two, or three on the list, rather than number eight, nine, or ten. There is a good deal of anxiety on the part of gentlemen engaged in the discussion that from them shall emanate the arguments upon which the debate turns. The gentleman knows that when the list of members who desire to debate is put into the Speaker's hands, or into the hands of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, men are generally urgent to know just when their turns will come. Now, I think we can dispose of all the other paragraphs of this bill in two days, and I do not think the time between that and Saturday will be wasted.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I defer to the greater experience of the chairman of the committee. Probably the question will settle itself as we progress.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] for unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand the scope of the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. When we return to this paragraph, will opportunity be given to amend the paragraph?

Mr. BINGHAM. My proposition is simply this: I ask consent at this time that when the paragraph relating to the Civil Service Commission is reached it be postponed, without prejudice, until the other paragraphs of the bill have been passed, and that then, having under consideration only that paragraph, an agreement be reached as to the time for general debate upon it, or that we allow the debate to run on for a reasonable length of time and then try to reach an agreement as to the limit.

Mr. BLAND. My question was, what latitude will be given for amendment of the paragraph?

Mr. BINGHAM. The rules limit the latitude.

Mr. BLAND. Can any amendments be offered to the paragraph?

Mr. BINGHAM. As I understand the rules, there is only one possible line of legislation operative—that is, to move to strike the paragraph out, or to move to reduce the appropriation which it carries.

Mr. BLAND. Then we can not change the law?

Mr. BINGHAM. We can not change the law upon this bill.

Mr. BLAND. For what purpose, then, do we prolong the debate?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is for the Committee of the Whole to determine. The committee is to pass upon the proposition. That is a matter for the House; and we all know that the House is going to debate the proposition.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest to the gentleman that he should not divulge executive secrets of the other side.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman from Missouri desires to make any statement to the House——

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not wish to do so. Has the proposition of the gentleman been agreed to?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands there is no objection to the proposition.

Mr. BINGHAM. I suggest that we now fix some time for general debate on the other paragraphs of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Suppose we fix one hour and a half.

Mr. BINGHAM. To be equally divided.

Mr. DOCKERY. Or so much thereof as may be necessary. That will be agreeable, I believe, to the gentlemen on this side.

Mr. BINGHAM. I then ask unanimous consent that the general debate on the other propositions in this bill continue for an hour and a half, to be equally divided between the two sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that general debate on the other provisions of the bill be limited to one hour and a half, to be equally divided between the two sides, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] to control the time on his side of the House and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] to control the time in opposition. Is there objection? [A pause.] The Chairs hears none.

Mr. MAXWELL. Does that order apply to the whole bill?

The CHAIRMAN. To all the provisions of the bill excepting that relating to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MAXWELL. It seems to me the time suggested is too short.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule there will be what is called the five-minute debate on each paragraph as reached. The present order applies only to the general debate.

Mr. MAXWELL. I hope the debate will not be limited upon an important measure of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The order requested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been made. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is recognized.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] is desirous of giving attention to other important business almost immediately after the present hour has expired. I therefore yield to him fifteen minutes, which I will extend if necessary.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman, on Tuesday last the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] made some remarks in reference to the civil-service law, during which he was asked in regard to the position of the Massachusetts Republicans. In the course of that debate some things which were and some things which were not said appeared in the RECORD. According to the RECORD, it appears that the Massachusetts Republicans on this floor were taunted why they did not make answer to the statements made by the gentleman from Ohio.

As I was in my seat at that time, and did not hear the remarks which were afterwards put in the RECORD, no one may criticise the absence of a reply at that time; but I wish now to say a few words in regard to the statements made by my friend from Ohio, undoubtedly to be much more ably followed by remarks to be made later in the debate by other gentlemen from Massachusetts, which will in a measure explain the feeling of Massachusetts Republicans upon the proposed movement against the civil-service law.

Mr. Chairman, I was present in yonder gallery on the 4th of January, 1883. I remember how this room was filled with the representatives of the people. They had come into office with a Republican majority in the election which placed James A. Garfield, of Ohio, in the Presidential chair. Mr. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, brought in on that morning the bill which has since been known as the civil service reform law. When he rose in his place to present it, there was a general cry all over the House, "Vote!" "Vote!" and a general disinclination to debate the subject. The Republicans, who formed the majority, felt that they were in duty bound by their platform and their pledges to pass the bill; and a considerable number of Democrats, headed by Mr. Willis, of Kentucky, sided with them in favor of the measure.

There was hardly any debate.

The bill passed this House by a vote of 155 to 47. It is still on the statute book. It has never been changed. As a matter of curiosity, I have examined the list of those present and voting on that day who are now members of the House. I find that of the 47 who voted against that bill, only 3 are members to-day. I am grieved to find that one is a Republican, and I should not quote his name in this connection except that the record must be made intact. The three gentlemen who voted in that hopeless minority were Messrs. BLAND of Missouri, MCMILLIN of Tennessee, and STEELE of Indiana; and the gentlemen who voted to put this bill on the statute books, which has not been changed in one iota, included, of those who are now members, Messrs. BINGHAM of Pennsylvania (who has the pending bill in charge), Mr. CANNON of Illinois, Mr. DINGLEY of Maine, Mr. GROUT of Vermont, Mr. HARMER of Pennsylvania, Mr. HEPBURN of Iowa, Mr. HITT of Illinois, Mr. UPDEGRAFF of Iowa, Mr. WADSWORTH of New York, and Mr. REED of Maine, as well as the present Chief Executive, Mr. McKinley, of Ohio.

Since that time, Mr. Chairman, no effort has been made to change the civil service reform law, except in 1890, when this appropriation bill was under consideration and a motion was made to strike out the appropriation for the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will allow an interruption, inasmuch as my name has been used, it is proper for me to say that I never yet had occasion to apologize for my vote against that bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BRUMM. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me, I think I also was one of those who voted against the bill at that time, together with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH].

Mr. BARRETT. I omitted to use the gentleman's name in that connection, and take pleasure in including him with Mr. BLAND and Mr. STEELE——

Mr. BRUMM. I am very proud to be included with them on that vote. [Applause.]

Mr. MARSH. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me to decorate his speech with my name, as one gentleman who voted against that bill, I will be glad to have the opportunity of so expressing myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARRETT. I should be very glad indeed to have the name of the gentleman from Illinois included.

Mr. MARSH. And allow me to say, in the presence of this House, that there is no service I have ever rendered in this body and no vote which has given me more satisfaction and gratification than my vote on that occasion. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BARRETT. I do not reflect, Mr. Chairman, upon anybody in that selection, when I mention the names either of Mr. STEELE, Mr. BRUMM, Mr. MARSH, or Mr. BLAND. I simply state a matter of record, which is accessible to all, and in doing so have cited the names of those who appear on the roll call on either side of the question, leaving it to the House and to the country to decide——

Mr. CANNON (interrupting). Will the gentleman allow an interruption just there?

Mr. BARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will permit me, I did not catch exactly his remarks, but understand that my name is mentioned as voting for the enactment of the original civil service law, in 1883, I believe it was.

Mr. BARRETT. Yes, in 1883, January.

Mr. CANNON. My recollection is that I did vote for it.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to say further, with the consent of the gentleman, in that connection, that at the time I was in favor of a civil-service law, as I am now, covering real civil service reform. [Applause.] I did not dream then that by orders of the Executive the civil service would become in many respects an uncivil service. [Applause.]

I am and have been a true friend of civil service reform. I believe it should run to every employee of the Government whose skill is required and who does not exercise an administrative function involving a discretion and affecting a policy. But where administrative functions are exercised involving the use of a discretion, then the Administration charged with the conduct of affairs and responsible to the people should be at perfect liberty to have its administrative officeholders in harmony with its policy.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me a single moment here? I will give him additional time.

Mr. BARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. My name has been given first in connection with the remarks the gentleman has been submitting, because, I presume, it is in the alphabetical order of those who voted on that occasion.

That bill was brought into the House by Mr. Kasson, then a member from Iowa—the bill to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers—in 1883, Senate bill No. 133. I know it was brought in by him, and he at once called the previous question upon it. Under our rules then there were allowed but twenty minutes' debate on a side, and therefore there was literally no debate upon it. The civil-service debate was exclusively in the Senate, and during that debate not once on the part of Mr. Pendleton, in charge of it, and Mr. HAWLEY, but frequently was the declaration made—all through the entire discussion—that the effect of the legislation then proposed was to cover only about 10,000 subordinate employees of the Government, and was simply a tentative or temporary proposition.

Mr. PEARSON. And did not touch tenure of office.

Mr. BINGHAM. As the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated. it has not been changed from that day to this, and as he has cited the names of those who voted for it as originally proposed, when it was stated at the time it embraced only about 10,000 subordinate officers of the Government, with forty or fifty officials—I wish to say that if that policy had been carried out as originally intended there would have been no criticism of the extension of that service as a result of the order of the President of the United States on May 6, 1896, and there would have been no occasion for provoking the debate on the part of the House that will follow in connection with the appropriation for that bureau. [Applause.]

I merely desired to place myself straight on this question. I voted for the act in 1883, covering, as it was supposed to cover, 10,000 subordinate officers; but if there had been an idea, I imagine, in the minds of anybody that this would have been extended by Executive order to embrace some 87,000 subordinate officers of the Government, I for one would have voted against it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] allow me——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] suspend for a moment? The gentleman from Georgia states that he rises to a point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I insist on the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that under the discussion of this bill it is not proper to open up this matter to the apology of our Republican friends who years ago voted for the civil-service law. If that is to be done, I want the order of debate suspended, so that it may become general.

Mr. BINGHAM. No; I will suggest to the gentleman that had his name been mentioned, had he had the good fortune to have been with us that long, I do not know how he would have voted, but I am very sure that if he had changed his position with reference to the original law and the application of it to-day the House would have allowed him to be heard.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] to ask leave that those on that side who voted for the law may file general apologies for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] will allow me, I desire, in order to corroborate the statement which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] has just made with regard to the original intent of the law, to read what Mr. Pendleton himself said as to the scope and purpose of the law. Mr. Pendleton in the Senate at that time said:

> There has been great misapprehension as to the methods and scope of the bill. The bill simply applies to the Executive Departments of the Government here in Washington and to those offices throughout the country, post-offices and custom-houses, which employ more than 50 persons—35 offices—and applies to not more than 10,000 employees.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying when interrupted a moment ago by gentlemen desiring to "correct their record," the only attempt ever made to strangle this law was in 1890, when a motion was made in this House not to appropriate for the maintenance of the Civil Service Commission. In that debate the following utterance was made by a Republican:

> If the Republican party of this country is pledged to any one thing more than to another, it is to the maintenance of the civil-service law and its efficient execution; not only that, but to its enlargement and further application to the public service. The law as it stands upon our statute books to-day was put there by Republican votes. It was a Republican measure. Every national platform of the Republican party since its enactment has declared not only in favor of its continuance in full vigor, but in favor of its enlargement, so as to apply more generally to the public service.

A MEMBER. Who said that?

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman, that utterance was made by William McKinley, of Ohio, and William McKinley has never taken back one word of that utterance up to to-day. In 1890 this House of Representatives, being Republican, voted down the proposition to strike out that appropriation, and it has been made with unerring certainty every year since then, whether this House was under Republican or Democratic control.

Now, a good many people seem to think that this law is something new, and that Grover Cleveland found new intricacies in it. He extended it for partisan and political purposes in the most unprecedented way. How that abuse may be corrected I will show later on. Just now I desire to show that the law is Republican and always Republican.

In the inaugural addresses of President Hayes, of Ohio, and of James A. Garfield, of Ohio, and of William McKinley, of Ohio, the three illustrious statesmen of that Commonwealth whom the Republicans of this country have made President—in the inaugural addresses of those three distinguished men civil service reform has not only been indorsed, but has also been recommended for enlargement and extension.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BINGHAM. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BARRETT. I think I will get through in about the time I indicated.

Mr. BINGHAM. In five minutes?

Mr. BARRETT. In six or eight minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield ten minutes longer to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BARRETT. The Republican party of Massachusetts has accepted these declarations, based in every case upon the utterances of Republican national conventions upon which our Presidents have been elected, in good faith. The Republican party of Massachusetts in every State convention has affirmed its loyalty to civil service reform. The Republican party of Massachusetts, this very autumn, in spite of the fact that my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] says he does not know it, expressed its indorsement of civil service reform and urged its extension.

Now, my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has stated, as showing the uprising of public sentiment upon this matter, that the Toledo convention of 1897 denounced civil service reform in the bitterest language.

I have taken pains to look up the Republican declaration in Ohio in 1897 as adopted on June 24 at Toledo.

This is what the Republicans of Ohio said. Remember that it had been mooted about for weeks before that convention that when the Republicans of Ohio met the civil-service law would be strangled at their hands. But here is the declaration of the Republicans of Ohio:

> We denounce the violation of the spirit of the civil-service act by President Cleveland in those orders which extended its operation beyond its purpose and intent, and demand such revocation of orders or modification of the law as will accomplish its manifest purpose.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it would appear that the Republicans of Ohio, supposing that they meant what they said, did not demand anything except such revocation of orders as would counteract the effect of Mr. Cleveland's sweeping Executive order of last spring, or, failing in that, a "modification" of the law. Is it not fair to insist that the Republican members of Congress, whether from Ohio or elsewhere, should leave to the person authorized by law to make them such "revocation of orders" as he may deem wise—to our own President, Mr. McKinley?

So far as that is concerned, Mr. Chairman, the Republicans of Massachusetts go hand in hand with the Republicans of Ohio in demanding that the sweeping orders of last spring issued by Grover Cleveland shall be modified and amended by the wisdom of William McKinley, so that the dishonest, the incompetent, and inefficient shall be weeded out of the public service and civil service reform be not used as a blanket to keep in place men in high positions not clerical, who should, by every principle of good government, be in close political harmony with the Administration.

But, in my judgment, this House is not called upon to take any steps to accomplish that result.

Mr. McKinley has the power to revoke or amend any order issued by his predecessor, and we have Mr. McKinley's assurance, in his message, read here one week ago yesterday, that he proposes to observe the law. Says he:

> During the past few months the service has been placed upon a still firmer basis of business methods and personal merit. While the right of our veteran soldiers to reinstatement in deserving cases has been asserted, dismissals for merely political reasons have been carefully guarded against, the examinations for admittance to the service enlarged and at the same time rendered less technical and more practical, and a distinct advance has been made by giving a hearing before dismissal upon all cases where incompetency is charged or demand made for the removal of officials in any of the Departments. This order has been made to give to the accused his right to be heard, but without in any way impairing the power of removal, which should always be exercised in cases of inefficiency and incompetency, and which is one of the vital safeguards of the civil service reform system, preventing stagnation and deadwood, and keeping every employee keenly alive to the fact that the security of his tenure depends not on favor, but on his own tested and carefully watched record of service.
> Much of course still remains to be accomplished before the system can be made reasonably perfect for our needs. There are places now in the classified service which ought to be exempted, and others not classified may properly be included. I shall not hesitate to exempt cases which I think have been improperly included in the classified service or include those which in my judgment will best promote the public service. The system has the approval of the people, and it will be my endeavor to uphold and extend it.

Let me say to the Republicans of this House, the country is watching us with jealous eyes. It expects, and has the right to expect, some great pieces of legislation. The body politic is waiting upon our action. With eager lips the people who won the victory of 1896 are asking us to remedy the defects in our currency system, are asking us to provide for the completion of the Nicaragua Canal, for the annexation of Hawaii, and they are asking us for much important legislation whose consideration engrosses the public mind, to which the Republican party is irrevocably pledged. Yet we are told that the Republicans of this House are proposing to put ourselves and President McKinley in the unfortunate position that we propose to take a part in the steps he is taking for the reform of the civil service and the correction of Grover Cleveland's orders.

We are furnishing to the other side the very material which they most desire, in order that they may go before the country another year and say we have broken our pledges, that we have not had faith in our President, and that we have been paltering and bickering over these offices which are of small account in comparison with the great problems over which the nation throbs.

Mr. Chairman, we Republicans of Massachusetts are pledged to civil service reform as every Republican of the country is, especially my friend from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, who is one of the few members of the House who, being a member of the last convention at St. Louis, active and potent in every way, remained in that body while the platform was adopted without opposition, thus, according to the ethics of Massachusetts Republicanism, committing himself without shadow of turning to stand by the principles therein set forth.

Mr. BROSIUS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state what may have escaped his memory, and that is, that the honorable Senator from his own State, Senator HOAR, said in the debate in the Senate when this measure was originally before that body, that it was tentative, that it was at the start made applicable to a part of the service, and that if it proved useful it would be extended and developed until it covered the entire service.

Mr. TAWNEY. By legislative enactment or by Executive orders?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The law contains within itself provisions for subsequent extension, which is notice to everybody who voted for it that it might be extended to other Departments, and it is a little late in the day to pretend that the original bill was passed through Congress by subterfuge.

Mr. BARRETT. What is this proposition here to-day?

William McKinley is the Republican President of the United States.

He has given his word, in his message, no longer ago than a week, that he proposes, after due examination, study, and investigation, to make such remedies in the execution of the law as in the judgment of the Executive are proper and wise.

Do the Republicans of this House propose to take issue with President McKinley? Do they propose to bring this up as a matter for legislative enactment, and thereby cripple his hands? I tell my friend from Ohio and every other Representative upon this floor who is chafing under the execution of the civil-service law as practiced by Grover Cleveland that further legislation attempting to change the statute will simply tie the hands of the President, who has already promised to do what is right and proper under the circumstances.

The Republicans of Massachusetts did not originally sustain Mr. McKinley as the nominee for the Presidency. We had no prophets who prophesied his nomination. We had no managers who went through the country bringing it about. [Laughter.] But when he was nominated and when the election came we gave him the largest majority ever given in Massachusetts for any candidate for the Presidency.

Now that he is President and is standing upon the Republican platform, now that we have his own solemn statement that he proposes to make such changes in the rules and in the administration of the law as are fit and proper, I answer all inquiring friends who want to know the position of the Republicans of Massachusetts that we stand for letting this matter alone in Congress, leaving it where it belongs, in the hands of the Republican President, William McKinley. I think I voice the sentiment of every Massachusetts Representative on this floor when I say that we propose, so far as our strength goes, to contest every proposed change in the law, which at this time could only redound to the benefit of our Democratic adversaries and hamper the President of the United States in bringing about the reforms which he has already promised.

We are Republicans. We helped to make the St. Louis platform. It is in line with every declaration of the Republican party on this subject for the past quarter of a century, and we propose to stand right there, and not to give any aid or encouragement to the common enemy by introducing or supporting new legislation whose only effect, if it goes beyond what the President can already do without legislation, will be to incur his veto, to divide the Republican ranks, and to give our Democratic friends such an advantage as they so eagerly welcomed a week ago when a member on this side of the House declared his approval of that plank in the Democratic platform which proposes to hand over the civil service to the spoilsmen. [Applause.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I should not occupy the attention of the committee at this time had it not been for the fact that my colleague [Mr. BARRETT] has done so at some length. He appears to have chafed under the injustice of an accusation that he has been silent hitherto when the subject of the civil service has been in debate. I confess that that accusation troubles me very little. I confess it did not seem to me very important that the position of the Republicans of Massachusetts should be stated in a thirty-minutes debate upon the question whether some parts of the President's message should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency or should be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

I had occasion to know, from my committee service, that this whole subject would be up for debate at large at a later period in the session, and I preferred to reserve whatever remarks I should have to submit upon the subject for an appropriate time. Everyone knows that there is no question about the general position of the Representatives from the State of Massachusetts upon this subject. Some of them will state their views themselves, as I shall do later. But, Mr. Chairman, this question is broader than the limits of the State of Massachusetts, broader than the limits of the State of Ohio, and I for one am ready to listen with deference to the suggestions and opinions of Representatives from all parts of the Union, and I do not propose to control my action in advance before I have heard debate upon this or any subject. One other point as to the reference which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] made to Massachusetts in his speech upon Tuesday last. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I have been here long enough to have become rather tired of the personal controversies that occur upon this floor as the result of a good-natured reference by some member to the delegation from some other State. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] the other day, when he replied to my colleague on the other side of the House, to say that Massachusetts was "a little better than the other States in this Union." I was not certain whether it was only the final prevailing of the truth in his mind [laughter] or a good-natured fling, and I did not care very much, because I was quite confident that my friend from Ohio had no hostility either to the State of Massachusetts or to its Representatives, and I did not propose to occupy the attention of the House on the subject, and should not have done so now merely to reply to a good-natured reference of that sort.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I like to have these kindergarten exercises of statesmanship forced upon the House occasionally [laughter], and I am delighted to have an opportunity to be mustered in as a friend and admirer of nearly everything that Massachusetts has ever done, and of nearly all the men that she has sent to Congress—not quite all; I hold a reservation in my own mind. [Laughter.] It is a great thing for a State of the magnitude of Massachusetts to be able to communicate with the country in a speech of only ten or fifteen minutes, to be able to state the sentiments of the entire State by the voice of a single man and to have that utterance taken as the voice of Massachusetts and of her magnificent delegation on this floor.

I heard somebody say, "What about the Republicans of Massachusetts?" and I hardly recognized where the inquiry came from. I did not know until afterwards who it was that had said it. I replied, "Massachusetts is always a little better than the rest of us." Well, she is in a great many respects; but I did not intend to admit it, and I do not propose now to admit it. I intended it as a good-natured answer to an interruption which was intended, as I suppose, to be good-natured.

Mr. MOODY. And I so understood it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So gentlemen around me understood it. If I am called upon occasionally to testify, I will testify that there is no State in this Union excepting one—Ohio—that I have a higher regard and respect and admiration for than I have for the State in which my mother was born and in which my ancestors are buried.

Now, then, when the proper time comes in this debate, I hope gentlemen on both sides of the question will debate upon their judgment and not upon the question of what somebody else has said. Statesmanship that can only repeat what somebody else has said is the same statesmanship that the parrot indulges in very often in the course of his morning ablutions. [Laughter.]

Now, just one other word, for I will not discuss now the civil-service question. When we come to debate the question who it is that has forsaken the St. Louis platform and has gone off and erected new idols, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT], to whom I commend this suggestion, will allow me to call his attention to this plank in the platform adopted at St. Louis, which I stood by and did not protest against. I plead guilty to that; neither did the gentleman.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Just let me read this plank of that platform, and then I shall be through.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR (reading):

CUBA.

From the hour of achieving their own independence, the people of the United States have regarded with sympathy the struggles of other American peoples to free themselves from European domination. We watch with deep and abiding interest the heroic battle of the Cuban patriots against cruelty and oppression, and our best hopes go out for the full success of their determined contest for liberty. The Government of Spain having lost control of Cuba, and being unable to protect the property or lives of resident American citizens, or to comply with its treaty obligations, we believe that the Government of the United States should actively use its influence and good offices to restore peace and give independence to the island.

[Applause.]

Mr. BARRETT. I think I ought to take up——

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to state—I think I have been very accommodating——

Mr. BARRETT. The gentleman from Ohio has called my attention to a plank of the Republican platform, and I think I have a right——

Mr. BINGHAM. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BARRETT. One minute.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. BARRETT. I am proud, Mr. Chairman, to appear as the humble defender of the President of the United States against the Representative from Ohio. If I could find the plank which the gentleman has read from the St. Louis platform—but I can not in this book—I would quote it. That plank says that when Spain is unable to control——

Mr. GROSVENOR. No, no; it does not say any such thing.

Mr. BARRETT. Let me find it; I should like to read it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It says that Spain has lost control of the island.

Mr. BARRETT. Let me read it. Under the head of "Cuba" this declaration is made:

The Government of Spain having lost control of Cuba, and being unable to protect the property or lives of resident American citizens or to comply with its treaty obligations, we believe that the Government of the United States—

And so forth.

Mr. MAHON. Go on and finish the reading.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The "and so forth" is the main part.

Mr. BARRETT (continuing the reading):

we believe that the Government of the United States should actively use its influence and good offices to restore peace and give independence to the island.

A MEMBER. Read it all.

Mr. BARRETT. That is the end of it.

Now, we have the assurance of President McKinley that under this new administration the Government of Spain seems in a way to exert——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then the conditions have changed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BARRETT. I ask further time. I was obliged to wait until this extract was found.

Mr. BINGHAM. Go on.

Mr. BARRETT. We said that unless Spain protected the lives of American citizens we would interfere.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No, sir; we did not say any such thing.

Mr. BARRETT. President McKinley says that Spain has released American prisoners and that our rights in Cuba are being carefully protected. I declare, as against the implication of the gentleman from Ohio, that that plank of the Republican platform is being maintained and that William McKinley is doing his duty in that respect, as he is in respect to the civil-service law. Both matters can be safely left by the Republicans in this House to his judgment and prudence.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So do I. Conditions have changed; and the position of the Executive has changed. Conditions have changed; and the position of the legislative department may change. [Applause.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I shall not emulate the example of gentlemen on the other side, who, with hot haste, have sought to precipitate a discussion upon civil service reform, although the consideration of that paragraph has been postponed until we shall have concluded the other paragraphs of the bill. I will content myself at this time with the remark that our Republican friends—at least a great number of them—seem to be eager to begin the assault upon the civil-service law, to which the Republican party is committed by the declarations of its national platforms. Nor shall I trench upon the Cuban question.

I may say, however, that the platform of the Republican party pronounced in favor of Cuban independence; the platform of the Democratic party was emphatic in the tender of the sympathies of the American people to the struggling patriots of Cuba. I have only to regret that when it comes to action here, we find the Democratic side solidly arrayed in behalf of the patriots of Cuba, while our friends on the other side, led by the Chief Executive, favor a policy of delay and procrastination. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I propose to come now to the bill under consideration. The expenditures of the Government exceed its income. This is the present condition of the Treasury, and has been its condition for a number of years past. The original Treasury deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, was $69,803,260.58; the year following it dropped to $42,805,223.18, and then to $25,203,245.10 during the fiscal year 1896, and again in 1897 there was a further decrease to $18,052,454.41. The deficiency in income from July 1, 1897, to the 1st of the present month was $46,101,493.93.

The deficiency under the operation of the Dingley law from the 1st day of August to the 11th day of this month amounted to $36,300,732.49. So that it is obvious that the income of our Government is unequal to the task of meeting its current liabilities. That is the situation which now confronts us.

In this connection I desire to call attention to other facts. The expenditures of the Government during the last decade have been rapidly and abnormally increasing. The total ordinary expenditures from 1882 to 1889, inclusive—and I am not dealing with the question of appropriations, but with actual expenditures—the ordinary expenditures of the Government from 1882 to 1889, inclusive, a period of eight years, excluding only the sinking fund, aggregated $2,509,203,988.29.

The total ordinary expenditures from 1890 to 1897, inclusive, another period of eight years, excluding only the sinking fund, amounted to $3,509,055,254.45.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the actual expense of conducting the various branches of the public service, exclusive of payments on the public debt, during the last eight fiscal years exceeded the expenditures of the eight preceding fiscal years exactly $999,851,266.16. I desire to repeat that statement in substance, so that its importance may be fully appreciated. During the past eight fiscal years the ordinary expenditures exceeded the expenditures for the eight prior years in round numbers by one billion of dollars. This stupendous increase should challenge the thoughtful attention of all taxpayers.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the average actual outlay from 1882 to 1889, inclusive, amounted to $313,650,498.53 each year.

The average actual outlay from 1890 to 1897, inclusive, was $438,631,907.92 yearly; or, in other words, the average annual increase in the demands upon the Treasury from 1890 to 1897 over the period from 1882 to 1889 was $124,981,409.39.

This is not all, Mr. Chairman. I desire to present another exhibit. The total actual cost of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, excluding only payments on the public debt, was but $320,938,374.36. The total cost for 1897 leaped to $459,861,401.95. That is to say, Mr. Chairman, at the end of a single decade the annual expenses of the Government were increased by $138,938,027.59. The per capita cost was $5.47 in 1887 and $6.24 in 1897, an increase of 77 cents for each one of our population.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is obvious, in view of these startling Treasury exhibits, that we can only extinguish the existing deficiency by either one of two methods, or, it may be, by the employment of both. Congress must either increase taxation or reduce expenditures, or increase taxation and also reduce expenditures. I believe I voice the sentiment of Representatives on this side of the Chamber when I insist that we should limit expenditures. Our friends on the other side have hitherto pursued the other policy, and tried to meet the deficiency by increasing taxation, as was done by the Dingley Act. Confronted, however, with a deficiency under that act amounting at this time to $36,300,732.49, a policy of economy is suggested by the leaders of the Republican party. The Executive urges economy. All the chieftains proclaim it. Shall it be practiced by the committees having appropriations and this House?

I desire to say in reference to this bill, which has been prepared under the leadership of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], that in my judgment he has given to the preparation of its paragraphs ample care and exacting scrutiny, and is entitled to credit for reporting a bill so nearly in harmony with the policy of this side of the Chamber.

But, Mr. Chairman, if we are to curtail the cost of Government, it can not be done solely by this branch of Congress. If there is to be a satisfactory reduction of Government expenses, the Senate must concur, the Executive should be in harmony, the Departments must be in thorough sympathy. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the concluding paragraph of the President's message, wherein he suggests that there should be no increases, and decreases wherever possible, the Executive Departments submit estimates exceeding current appropriations by $26,787,453.92, thus compelling an estimated deficiency for the ensuing fiscal year of $21,647,885.85. The Departments submit these increases in excess of the amount of the current law.

I desire to be absolutely fair. These excessive estimates of the Departments are not without precedent. It has been their custom under all Administrations—under Mr. Cleveland, under Mr. Harrison, under this Administration—to submit estimates which largely exceed the demands of the public service. I make this criticism as supplemental to what was so well said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] a few days since. If there is to be retrenchment of public expenditures, the Executive Departments must heartily cooperate and bring down their estimates.

The Departments have usually asked for twenty-five to thirty-five million dollars more than Congress has appropriated. It follows, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the President, the Departments, the Senate, and the House of Representatives must all cooperate to properly curtail Government liabilities.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just one word in conclusion, because I do not desire to detain the committee. Some of our Republican friends at this time advocate economy because the condition of the National Treasury forbids extravagance. On this side of the Chamber we urge economy because, as Jefferson stated, we believe taxation burdens labor, and we desire to lighten the burdens of labor. Therefore we reduce appropriations, and in that way only are we enabled to reduce taxation.

I shall not detain the committee further, but will yield——

Mr. BINGHAM. Has the gentleman finished?

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would ask how much time remains on each side?

The CHAIRMAN. Fourteen minutes remain under the control of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has occupied sixteen minutes of his time. There remain twenty-nine minutes on one side and fourteen on the other.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4751) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STOKES, for ten days, on account of important public business.

To Mr. WHITE of North Carolina, for two days, on account of important business.

FUNERAL OF THE PRESIDENT'S MOTHER.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, it is well known that the funeral of the mother of the Chief Magistrate of the nation is to take place at about this hour; and conforming to the action of the Senate, and as a token of our sympathy and respect for the President, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

Gillett, and W. F. Holland. I move that the affidavits be referred to the Committee on Pensions to accompany that bill and to be considered in connection with it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I present a petition in favor of the passage of the Chicago Record's postal savings bank bill. It is accompanied by an affidavit showing that 662,257 signatures of citizens of the United States have been attached to these particular petitions. I should like to have the petition and accompanying statement made a part of the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois?

There being no objection, the petition and accompanying paper were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF ILLINOIS, County of Cook, ss:

Albert G. Beaunisne, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is business manager of the Chicago Record, a daily newspaper published in the city of Chicago, county of Cook and State of Illinois, and that he has caused to be circulated throughout a large part of the United States copies of a petition urging on Congress the passage of a certain bill for the establishment of postal savings banks identical with the copy hereto attached, and that said copies have been returned to him, and that they contain a total of 662,257 signatures, which signatures are, to the best of his knowledge and belief, the genuine signatures of citizens of the United States.

ALBERT G. BEAUNISNE.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 7th day of December, 1897.

[SEAL.] SAMUEL R. WELLS,
Notary Public.

THE CHICAGO RECORD'S POSTAL SAVINGS BANK BILL.

We, the undersigned citizens of the United States of America, residing in ——, ——, respectfully and earnestly petition the National Congress to enact into law at its earliest opportunity the following bill:

A bill to establish a postal savings bank system and to provide for the conduct and regulation of the same.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to make the Post-Office Department available for the protection of small savings, with the pledge of the National Government for the due repayment of the same, there is hereby established a postal savings bank system, with a central bank and branch banks, under the direction and supervision of the Postmaster-General. There shall be established at the seat of Government as a branch of the Post-Office Department a chief office, to be known as the "central bank." And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to designate such money-order post-offices as he may select for that purpose as branch postal savings banks, to receive small deposits and repay the same, subject to regulations made by him in conformity with the provisions of this act. The system provided for in this act shall be known as the "postal savings bank" system, and the moneys received by, transferred to, or in any wise appertaining to said bank as "postal savings funds," which moneys shall be deemed and taken to be public moneys and moneys in the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 2. That any person may become a depositor under this act. Married women may make deposits and control the same as if they were sole. Minors above the age of 12 years may make deposits and control the same as if they were adults. Holders of trust funds may deposit the same as trustees. No deposit for a less amount than $1 shall be received and all deposits of more than $1 shall be in multiples of $1. The deposits of any one individual provided for in this act shall not exceed $300 in any one year ended June 30, and when the amount of deposits standing to the credit of a depositor shall exceed $1,000 no interest shall accrue on the sum in excess of said $1,000.

SEC. 3. That every deposit received by any postmaster designated for that purpose shall be entered by him at the time in the depositor's book, and the entry shall be attested by the postmaster and by the dated stamp of his office; and the amount of such deposit shall upon the day of such receipt be reported by such postmaster to the Postmaster-General, and the acknowledgment of the Postmaster-General signified by the officer whom he shall designate for that purpose shall be forthwith transmitted to the depositor, and it shall be the duty of every depositor to see that he receives such acknowledgment. If he does not receive the acknowledgment within twenty days of the time of making his deposit with the postmaster, it shall be the duty of the depositor to notify the Postmaster-General of such fact, and to demand from the Postmaster-General the acknowledgment due him.

SEC. 4. That the Postmaster-General shall furnish and keep for sale at branch postal savings bank offices adhesive savings stamps of the denominations of 5 cents and 10 cents, to be known as "postal savings stamps," and shall also furnish for the use of purchasers of such stamps cards upon which such stamps when sold shall be affixed, said cards to be known as "postal savings cards." Postal savings cards with stamps affixed to the amount of $1 shall be received by postmasters as deposits of $1. The Postmaster-General shall provide by regulation for the redemption and cancellation of postal savings stamps of $1 or less in amount when properly affixed to postal savings cards. In no case shall ordinary postage stamps be used as postal savings stamps.

SEC. 5. That on demand of a depositor or person legally authorized to claim on account of a depositor, made in such form as prescribed for repayment of deposits or any part thereof, the authority of the Postmaster-General for such repayment shall be transmitted to the depositor forthwith and the depositor shall be absolutely entitled to receive such sum with the least possible delay after making demand at the post-office.

SEC. 6. That interest shall be paid on deposits at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, which said interest shall begin the first day of the calendar month following the date of deposit and shall cease on the last day of the calendar month preceding the date of withdrawal. Interest accrued shall be added to principal on the 30th day of June of each year. No interest shall be computed on any fractional part of a dollar standing to the credit of a depositor.

SEC. 7. That every depositor shall forward his pass book to the Postmaster-General in an envelope, which will be furnished him at the post-office for that purpose, once in each year, namely, on the anniversary of the day on which his first deposit was made, for examination and for entry of interest standing to his credit.

SEC. 8. That the Postmaster-General shall cause to be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, or with an assistant treasurer of the United States, or with a national bank designated as a depository of public moneys under the provisions of section 5153, Revised Statutes, or with such post-offices of the first and second classes as he may have designated as depositories of postal savings funds, to the credit of said Treasurer, all postal savings funds, except money necessarily held in reserve to pay withdrawals and to meet the current expenses of the business; and said Treasurer shall cause an account to be opened with the Postmaster-General, to be called the "Postal savings bank account," upon which shall be credited all funds received from or on account of said bank; and sums transferred to postmasters by draft of the Postmaster-General upon said Treasurer, to meet the withdrawal demands of depositors or the current expenses of the business, shall be charged to said account; and at the close of each calendar month the Secretary of the Treasury shall transmit to the Postmaster-General a summary of said account for such month and of all transactions by his Department under the operation of this act.

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to invest in interest-bearing bonds of the United States, or in bonds the principal and interest of which are guaranteed by the United States, funds arising from the operation of this act in excess of what shall be deemed by the Postmaster-General necessary to keep on hand as reserve for redemption purposes and for expenses of administering this act. Whenever it may be found impracticable to secure United States bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, invest such funds in State bonds and in the bonds of municipalities and counties in the United States, subject to the restrictions hereinafter provided:

First. The Secretary of the Treasury may invest such funds in State bonds and in the bonds of municipalities and counties guaranteed by the State in which such municipalities and counties are located. If, for any reason, any State shall fail to make payment of principal or interest on bonds in which postal savings bank funds are invested, or shall fail to make good its guaranty of municipal or county bonds, the Postmaster-General shall refuse to receive deposits at branch postal savings banks within that State, and shall also refuse to pay interest on deposits standing to the credit of depositors at savings-bank offices within that State, accruing from and after the date he shall have set for refusal to accept any further deposits at branch postal savings banks in said State.

Second. Without such State guaranty the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, invest said funds in the bonds of municipalities having not less than 2,000 inhabitants according to the last preceding decennial census of the United States, or in the bonds of counties having not less than 40,000 inhabitants according to the last preceding decennial census: Provided, That the total bonded indebtedness of such municipalities or counties in whose bonds investment is made is not in excess of 5 per cent of the taxable valuation in such municipalities or counties: Provided further, That in all cases of investment in municipal or county bonds without State guaranty the bonds in which investment is made shall be approved by a commission composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General as safe and secure investments.

Third. Provided further, That in no case shall the amount invested in State bonds and the bonds of municipalities and counties of any State exceed twice the amount of deposits standing to the credit of depositors in that State.

SEC. 10. That the postmasters and other officers engaged in the receipt or repayment of deposits shall not disclose the name of any depositor or the amount of his deposit or withdrawal, except to the Postmaster-General or to such of his officers as are appointed to assist in carrying into operation the provisions of this act.

SEC. 11. That no sum of money deposited under this act shall at any time be liable to demand, seizure, or detention under any legal process against the depositor. Deposits and pass books shall not be transferable. Money deposited under this act shall not be subject to taxation by the United States or by any State.

SEC. 12. That the Postmaster-General may in his discretion require an additional bond of any postmaster whose office is designated a branch postal savings bank office.

SEC. 13. That the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Treasury, respectively, shall designate such officers and subdivisions of their Departments to take charge of business in connection with the postal savings bank as may be necessary. If the business of the postal savings bank shall require it, the Postmaster-General may appoint, subject to provisions of existing law, a "general superintendent of the postal savings bank," whose compensation shall be the same as that of the Superintendent of the Money-Order System; and whenever the business of said bank may require their services, he may appoint likewise one clerk of class 4, five clerks of class 1, and two laborers. Likewise the Secretary of the Treasury may, when in his opinion necessary for the keeping and settling of accounts of the postal savings bank, appoint in the office of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department the requisite clerks, in all not to exceed six, to wit, one clerk of class 4 and five clerks of class 2. And to provide for the compensation of said superintendent, clerks, and laborers for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money not otherwise appropriated. The Postmaster-General may provide for such clerical service in branch postal savings banks at post-offices of the first and the second classes as may be necessary, in accordance with the provisions of existing law applicable to the Money-Order System. At post-offices of the third and fourth classes the compensation for work in connection with the savings-bank service shall be such as the Postmaster-General shall by general regulation determine. The Postmaster-General may cause to be paid out of the proceeds of the postal savings bank business the expenses of administration, including the cost of the books, blanks, stationery, stamps, and printing. The provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, regarding blanks, blank books, and printed matter of the Money-Order Service shall apply in carrying out the provisions of this act. For the preliminary expenses of putting this act into operation and for meeting any deficit that may arise during the first year the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 14. That the Postmaster-General shall make the necessary rules and regulations for carrying into effect this act, including regulations regarding deposits by children under the age of 12 years and by trustees, and the final disposition of deposits of deceased persons; and such regulations shall be binding on all persons to the same extent as if they formed a part of this act; and the Postmaster-General may, from time to time, as may be found necessary to secure the best administration of this act, change such regulations; and the Postmaster-General shall transmit to Congress, on the first day of each session, a copy of all regulations made and in force, and of all changes made subsequent to his last report, and the reasons for such changes.

SEC. 15. That the Postmaster-General shall as soon as practicable after the close of each month make a report of all moneys received and paid during such month and the total amount of deposits at the end of such month, and such report shall be given publicity as soon after the close of the month as is practicable. The Postmaster-General shall make an annual report showing the amount of deposits received, the amount repaid to depositors, and the total amount due depositors for each year ending June 30; also of all expenses incurred and such other particulars and recommendations as he shall deem necessary. Such annual report shall be transmitted to Congress upon the first day of each regular session.

SEC. 16. That all statutes and parts of statutes now in existence or which may hereafter be enacted defining crimes and misdemeanors in the postal service, whether as burglary, larceny, embezzlement, forgery, counterfeiting, or misappropriation of funds, postal, money-order, or otherwise, and providing punishment therefor, be, and the same are hereby, extended and in all respects made applicable to the commission of and punishment therefor of all such crimes and misdemeanors in connection with the postal savings bank system or in connection with postal savings funds or any funds that may arise or be received under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 17. This act shall take effect and the system herein provided for shall go into operation at such time, within six months after its passage, as the Postmaster-General shall designate.

HATTIE A. PHILLIPS.

On motion of Mr. WARREN, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of S. 851, for the relief of Hattie A. Phillips, and the papers accompanying said bill be referred to the Committee on Claims, to be considered with S. 2013, of the same title, now pending before the latter committee.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1640) for the relief of Mrs. Emma D. Larsh and Charles M. Larsh, of Denver, Colo., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the bill (S. 2315) for the relief of Mrs. Emma D. Larsh, of Denver, Colo., and the bill (S. 2314) for the relief of Charles M. Larsh, of Denver, Colo., reported adversely thereon, and they were postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WARREN subsequently said: I move that the bill (S. 1640) for the relief of Mrs. Emma D. Larsh and Charles M. Larsh, of Denver, Colo., which was reported this morning by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] from the Committee on Public Lands, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2013) for the relief of Hattie A. Phillips, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

STATUE OF THE LATE ADMIRAL PORTER.

Mr. CHANDLER. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1610) directing the Secretary of the Navy to consider and report on the subject of a statue of the late Admiral David D. Porter. I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill; and the Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Navy to consider the subject of the erection in the city of Washington of a suitable statue of David D. Porter, lately the Admiral of the United States, and to report to Congress concerning the general design, reasonable cost, and appropriate location of such a statue.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SURVEY OF FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. WILSON on the 7th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is directed to send to the Senate a full and complete report of the operations of the Geological Survey in carrying out the provisions of that portion of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes," approved June 4, 1897, providing for the survey of the public lands that have been or may hereafter be designated as forest reserves by Executive proclamation, under section 24 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," and including public lands adjacent thereto which may be designated for survey by the Secretary of the Interior.

REPORT ON LABOR LAWS.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution providing for printing additional copies of the Second Special Report of the Commissioner of Labor, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That there be printed 8,000 additional copies, in cloth binding, of the Second Special Report of the Commissioner of Labor, comprising the labor laws of the United States and of the State and Territorial governments, being a report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, submitted July 20, 1892, and revised and annotated in accordance with concurrent resolution adopted March 5, 1896, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for distribution by the Department of Labor.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is it a fair distribution to give the Senate only 1,000 copies? That will be only about 10 copies apiece. The Commissioner of Labor is given 5,000 copies. It is an important publication, and there may be a considerable demand for it.

Mr. LODGE. It is an important publication.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ten copies will amount to very little. I observe that in the distribution of publications the number given to the Senate has been largely reduced. Take the Ethnological report and other reports; the number for the Senate has been cut down about two-thirds, and it is impossible for any one to keep up a continuous set of the publications.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator that this publication is entirely exhausted and there is great demand for it, especially a great demand to the Bureau directly, from labor organizations particularly all over the country.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend the resolution so as to give the Senate 1,500 copies and the House 3,000 copies, which will make 4,500 copies, giving the Commissioner of Labor 3,500 copies.

Mr. LODGE. I entirely agree to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

PARIS EXPOSITION OF 1900.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution providing for printing extra copies of the Report of the Special Commissioner of the United States to the International Exposition to be held in Paris in 1900, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 30,000 extra copies of the report of the Special Commissioner of the United States to the International Exposition to be held at Paris, 1900, 10,000 copies to be for the use of the Senate, 15,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for the use of the Department of State.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was to increase the number from 30,000 to 35,000 copies, and to add to the resolution:

And 5,000 copies for the use of the special commissioner.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is simply a preliminary report?

Mr. LODGE. It is merely a preliminary report of the special commissioner, who was there last summer. It is a very brief report.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

REPORT ON ITALIANS IN CHICAGO.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution to print additional copies of the Ninth Special Report of the Commissioner of Labor, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That there be printed and bound in cloth 8,000 additional copies of the Ninth Special Report of the Commissioner of Labor, relating to the Italians in Chicago, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for distribution by the Department of Labor.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest that the same amendment be made which was proposed to the first resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend the resolution so as to give to the Senate 1,500 copies, the House 3,000 copies, and the Commissioner of Labor 3,500 copies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 2791) to incorporate the Cooks Inlet, Tanana and Yukon Railroad Company and grant it a right of way over the public lands of the District of Alaska, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2808) for the relief of Winslow Warren; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DEBOE introduced a bill (S. 2809) for the relief of Robert Langston; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 2810) for the relief of William A. Grogan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2811) to place on the retired list of the Navy Louis V. Housel, late lieutenant of the Regular Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2812) for the relief of James McManemin; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 2813) granting a pension to Barney Smith (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2814) granting an increase of pension to Lafayette Taber, of Fort Dodge, Kans. (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2815) granting a pension to James Richardson (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2816) granting a pension to J. W. Phillips (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2817) granting an increase of pension to Hugh Irwin, of Hays City, Kans. (with accompanying papers).

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 2818) to amend sections 4948, 4956, and 4959 of the Revised Statutes, relating to copyrights; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2819) to examine, determine, and report the facts necessary to the establishment of free public highways into the Yosemite National Park, and appropriating moneys therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2820) authorizing the Alaska Railway and Transportation Company to construct, operate, and maintain a railroad, tramway, and telegraph line in the District of Alaska, and granting said company a right of way through Government lands in said District; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2821) to provide a home for aged and infirm colored people; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2829) for the relief of George Francis, who served as Harmon Francis in Company K, Ninety-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, during the war of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2830) authorizing the Postmaster-General to refund a certain sum of money to the Balfour Publishing Company, of Philadelphia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2831) to correct the military record of Perry J. Knoles; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2832) for the relief of the estate of Eliza Breckenridge, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL. In connection with the bill, I present the petition of James Breckenridge, administrator of the estate of Eliza Breckenridge, deceased, and a copy of his letters of administration and bond. I move that the petition and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Finance, to accompany the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH introduced a bill (S. 2841) for the relief of Arthur W. Kelley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REINDEER IN ALASKA.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to the Senate the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson upon "The introduction of domestic reindeer into the District of Alaska for 1897."

DEPUTY COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate, at the earliest date practicable, a copy of all the correspondence between the Treasury Department and any other Executive Department, between the Treasury Department and the Office of Internal Revenue, and between any subordinate officer of internal revenue and the Department or the Office of Internal Revenue; between the Solicitor of the Treasury and that Department, and between the Treasury Department and the Civil Service Commission, in regard to the legal right and authority of collectors of internal revenue to appoint their official deputies either from or outside of the so-called "eligible list," and either with or without a competitive examination; and also all communications received by the Department asserting or relative to the right of the Civil Service Commission to review or reverse the action of the Department concerning appointments or removals from office, and the replies of the Department thereto.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, if he does not deem it incompatible with the public interest, to send to the Senate a copy of his instructions to the special commissioners sent to Europe during the current year, to negotiate the holding of an international bimetallic monetary conference, their report or reports to him, and all such correspondence relating to the subject as he may have.

Mr. HOAR. Let the resolution be read again.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLEN. I trust that will not be done, and that the Senate will be permitted——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish we could hear what the Senator says. I am extremely anxious to hear.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. ALLEN. I was proceeding to say that I hope the resolution will not be sent to the Committee on Finance. There is no reason why the instructions to the commissioners should not be laid before the Senate, and if they have reported to the President, as the act of Congress required them to report, I can not see any reason why we should not have that report.

I trust there will be no attempt to bury this resolution or keep out of sight any instructions given or reports that may have been made.

Mr. HALE. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that he let the resolution go over a day, and perhaps he can make some arrangement in regard to the matter.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection. If it is objected to, let it go over, of course, so that it will come up to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that no objection is made to the resolution lying over until to-morrow, and that is the order.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HALE. I should like to take from the table the bill that came from the House. I ask that it be laid before the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 4753) making appropriations to provide for certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, was read twice by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. No; I should like to have it passed at the present time. It consists of only a few items, mainly the mileage item. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill; and the Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed of the report of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, in addition to the usual number, 500 copies of the report proper, 500 copies of the report of the assistant inspector-general on the State Homes, and 150 copies of the record of members, for the use of the Home.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing that when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, the 18th day of December, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock m. on Wednesday, January 5, 1898; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the resolution just received from the House be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the resolution is referred, I ask to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays the resolution before the Senate, and it will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 15, 1897.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, the 18th day of December, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Wednesday, January 5, 1898.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

COURTS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Committee on Indian Affairs at the last session reported favorably Senate bill 2365, which provided for the suspension of a certain clause in the Indian appropriation act of June 7, 1897. I am now directed by that committee to move that the House be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas, that the House be requested to return to the Senate Senate bill 2365.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD to-morrow morning a speech made by Hon. Samuel Sullivan Cox on civil-service reform March 12, 1878.

Mr. HAWLEY. It has been impossible to hear the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MILLS. I am simply asking to have reprinted in the RECORD to-morrow morning a speech on civil-service reform delivered in the House of Representatives March 12, 1878, by Samuel Sullivan Cox, of New York.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from Texas to ask to have it printed as a separate document.

Mr. MILLS. I will ask to have it printed as a separate document also.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request made by the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not wish to object unnecessarily or unkindly, but I can hardly see the necessity to go back twenty years to republish a speech already in the RECORD. There must be some extraordinary necessity or emergency to justify it.

Mr. MILLS. It is a very able discussion of the subject. My friend knows that I can take the speech and have it read as part of my remarks. I do not wish to make any remarks on the subject, but I should like to have the speech again printed that we may read it in connection with the discussion now going on.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask my friend the Senator from Texas who made the speech?

Mr. MILLS. Samuel Sullivan Cox, of New York.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator that if it should be printed in document form——

Mr. MILLS. I have made that request.

Mr. GALLINGER. We could then have access to it as a document. I should like to read it. I think there will be no objection to having it printed as a document.

Mr. MILLS. Then I ask to have it printed merely as a document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request to have the speech referred to printed as a document?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not make any objection to the request in that form.

There being no objection, the order was reduced to writing, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That so much of the speech of Hon. S. S. Cox, of New York, made in the House of Representatives March 12, 1878, as relates to the civil service of the United States, beginning near the bottom of the second column on page 1707, volume 7, part 2, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, and ending on page 1714 of said RECORD, be printed as a document.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 103) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1897, on the 17th day of said month; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RECOMMITMENT OF BILLS.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to consent that two bills reported back by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, which were introduced by myself, being the bill (S. 1246) to change the boundaries of the collection district of Galveston, Tex., and make Sabine Pass a port of entry and create a new collection district, and the bill (S. 1113) to establish a marine hospital at Sabine Pass, Tex., may be recommitted to that committee. I want to have some investigation regarding the bills. They were not, as I understand, investigated by the committee at all.

Mr. FRYE. They were investigated, and reports were made by the Department in relation to them; but as the Senator has recently become a member of the Committee on Commerce, I shall interpose no objection to his request for a recommittal of the bills.

Mr. MILLS. I did not know that the Department had made a report in those cases. That is the very thing that I wanted to have them recommitted for.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator will be obliged, then, to ask unanimous consent that the action of the Senate by which the bills referred to were indefinitely postponed may be reconsidered and that they be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLS. I make that request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas, that the action by which the two bills referred to by him were heretofore indefinitely postponed may be reconsidered and the bills recommitted to the Committee on Commerce? The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN THE VALLEY OF THE YUKON.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of joint resolution (S. R. 72) for the relief of American miners and other sufferers in the valley of the Yukon and its tributaries.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the joint resolution in line 15, after the words "United States," by inserting:

And to purchase and import reindeer, and to employ and bring in reindeer drivers not residents of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have something to say on this general subject. A resolution was presented the other day, and passed, covering substantially the whole of that ground, and the Committee on Military Affairs has already begun an inquiry. I did not catch the full details of this joint resolution, but the one adopted the other day contemplates relief to sufferers, and possibly the sending of some military force to convoy provisions to some place within the reach of miners, etc.

There are two resolutions already before the Committee on Military Affairs, one directed especially toward immediate relief and the other to a more general consideration of what the Army can do to keep the peace, protect settlers, and so forth. The subject, I think, is all now before the Military Committee. Does the Senator contemplate referring the joint resolution or having it passed now?

Mr. MCBRIDE. I desire the immediate consideration and passage of the joint resolution, in view of the report made to the Senate by the Secretary of War, showing that there is immediate and great danger of privation, and probably starvation, among our fellow-countrymen in the Yukon Valley.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the committee will report to the Senate both resolutions for the action of the Senate as soon as possible. We had an interview yesterday with the General of the Army and the Assistant Secretary of War. The Secretary of War will return to duty to-day. We are collecting some information we desire to print. That is all I have to say. I should like to have the joint resolution again read, if the Senator proposes immediate action.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent has been given for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. Does the Senator from Connecticut desire to have it re-read?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be again read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution as amended, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of War be authorized to purchase food and supplies, and to transport and distribute the same and food and other supplies furnished by or under the direction of the Portland Chamber of Commerce, Portland, Oreg., and by other like organizations and by individuals or corporations, for the relief of American miners and other sufferers in the valley of the Yukon River and its tributaries; and a sufficient sum of money, not exceeding $250,000, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the purposes of this joint resolution; and the Secretary of War is authorized, in his discretion, to use the military forces of the United States, and to purchase and import reindeer, and to employ and bring in reindeer drivers, not residents of the United States, and to employ private persons and such means of transportation as he may deem necessary to carry the purpose of this joint resolution into effect.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any more of the report than that?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This is the joint resolution itself.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought the Senator from Connecticut called for the reading of the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the joint resolution as amended which has been read. There is no report accompanying it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that there is no report. The joint resolution has not been before a committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg the Senator's pardon, there is a report—Senate Document No. 14, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, a letter from the Secretary of War.

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, yes: I understand there is a communication from the Secretary of War, but there is no report of a committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. No.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the joint resolution may be again read as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Iowa, the joint resolution will be again read as amended.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendment, the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. One moment. Before the joint resolution is reported to the Senate, I desire to say a word as to the question of gifts. I see the Senator seems to have paid no attention to the last part of the report of the Secretary of War, where he says:

The only possible routes by which supplies can be transported into the mining district at the present season would be either by the Chilkoot or White Pass through Lakes Linderman and Bennett, and down the Lewis and Yukon rivers over the ice, or through the Chilkat Pass and over Daltons Trail, approximately 700 miles and 550 miles, respectively, from Juneau, requiring from thirty to thirty-five days' travel from Juneau, a most hazardous and perhaps impossible trip, although it is believed it can be accomplished. From the best information that can be obtained it is believed that the use of reindeer will be the means by which these supplies can be gotten through, if at all. It is therefore recommended that reindeer be purchased in Lapland to the number of 500 and permission granted to bring reindeer drivers from that country; this upon the information that it requires much skill to manage these animals.

It is believed that supplies taken into that country need not, to any great extent, be furnished as a gratuity, but that many of the miners will be able to pay the cost of such supplies.

As we are going to send supplies and to furnish them to the miners there for the next year or two gratuitously, without any compensation, when they are able to pay for them, it seems to me rather strange.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I did not hear all that the Senator said, though I ought to have done so, but those who have been considering this subject say that there are a great many men in Alaska, or a large number, who do not ask to have anything given them; but it would be a very great relief indeed if the United States could send into that country commissary stores, such as are furnished to the Army, and sell them at a reasonable price, perhaps at a little trifle of advance to cover transportation, or sell them at the ordinary rate, if you choose, and also provide that in cases where there is destitution the United States may grant some relief gratuitously. It need not all be a gratuity.

Mr. COCKRELL. The joint resolution as it now stands makes this proposed relief a gratuity. It is a gift. Rich and poor alike take all they want; and all that will be carried there, as matter of course, will be taken in that way. It may support them probably for six months or a year, and by the time another season rolls around they will be asking another donation.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the Senator from Missouri will move to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs, where two or three similar resolutions have already been sent, and will come to the meeting to-morrow morning, we may perhaps be able to put the resolution in a little better shape than it is now.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no doubt the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, one of the distinguished leaders of this Senate, can make that motion himself just as easily as a subordinate of the committee can make it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and promise that a speedy report shall be made.

Mr. CARTER. It certainly will come to pass that this joint resolution, properly prepared to the satisfaction of the Committee on Military Affairs, will pass the Senate unanimously, without any dissenting voice. The same action will unquestionably obtain in the other branch of Congress, I assume. I take it that no motion at this time to refer is necessary, because of the keen anxiety, participated in by all, to send necessary relief to our citizens in the Klondike country; and I am sure the Senator from Oregon will readily appreciate the fact that progress will be made by consenting to the reference of this joint resolution to the committee now having the matter under consideration. The Acting Secretary of War and the General of the Army, as was well stated by the chairman of the committee, were yesterday evening consulted. The General of the Army has to-day transmitted to the chairman of the committee a full detailed statement of what the Army will require in the form of support from Congress in order to render the desired assistance. In the light of his suggestions, guided by an experience of over twenty years with reference to that Alaskan country, the committee can present to the Senate to-morrow morning a resolution that will cover all the details embodied in the joint resolution here presented, together with the necessary machinery for the proper execution of the resolution when transmitted to the War Department.

I suggest, therefore, that time will be saved, a more effective resolution will be passed, and the object in view be more thoroughly and effectively obtained by the Senator from Oregon consenting to the reference of the pending joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McBRIDE. Mr. President, the pending joint resolution was presented to the Senate on the 9th day of December. Upon objection made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], the joint resolution went over, in order that the Senate might obtain official information with reference to the actual condition of the American miners in the Yukon Valley. That information has been obtained in response to a Senate resolution calling upon the Secretary of War for such information, and it is upon the desks of Senators, printed as Senate documents numbered 14 and 15. In my own judgment, those documents conclusively establish the fact that relief is needed, and needed immediately; and that there ought to be no unnecessary delay either in legislation for that relief or in the equipment of an expedition in order to carry out the objects of that resolution.

With reference to the suggestion that this joint resolution should have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, I desire to call attention to the fact that within the life of the present Congress, during the last session, three similar resolutions for relief of sufferers were introduced into the Senate and passed without objection, and without reference to a committee, upon the same day and in the same session in which they were introduced. So that, in asking for the immediate consideration of this joint resolution upon the reports of the Secretary of War which lie upon the desks of Senators, I have not exceeded or gone beyond the precedents which have been established within the life of this Congress.

On the 23d day of March, 1897, Senate joint resolution No. 18, directing the Secretary of War to furnish tents to the sufferers from the floods in the Mississippi River, was presented in the Senate, read three times, and passed without reference to any committee. On the 5th day of April, 1897, Senate joint resolution No. 27, first session Fifty-fifth Congress, for the relief of the flood sufferers of the Mississippi Valley, was introduced and likewise passed without reference to any committee. On the 7th day of April, 1897, Senate joint resolution No. 29, appropriating $150,000 for the purchase and distribution of stores to assist destitute persons in the Mississippi Valley, was introduced and passed without a reference to any committee.

So, Mr. President, I believe these precedents fully establish the fact that it has been the practice of the Senate in cases of emergency of this kind, where our fellow-countrymen were suffering or were in a condition of destitution or in danger of privation or starvation, not to await the usual processes of committee consideration and the slow processes of legislation which prevail here in many instances.

But, Mr. President, in view of the evident reluctance of Senators of experience here to go on with the consideration of the joint resolution at this time, in view of the very practical suggestion of my friend the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], that real progress will be made in this joint resolution by its reference to a committee, and in view of the sentiment expressed on this floor, and as I concur with him in that practical judgment, I shall not oppose the reference to the committee, especially in view of the assurance of the Senator from Montana that a report may be expected, perhaps, to-morrow morning, so that really no serious delay may be occasioned by the reference of the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ACCOUNTS WITH PUBLIC-LAND STATES.

Mr. PETTIGREW. On the day before yesterday the Senate granted unanimous consent for the consideration of what is known as the 5 per cent bill, to reimburse certain of the public-land States. I now desire to ask that that bill may be made the unfinished business, not to interfere with the census bill or the immigration bill, after the Senate reconvenes in January.

Mr. COCKRELL. What bill is it?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is Order of Business No. 18, Senate bill 361, known as the 5 per cent bill, to reimburse certain of the public-land States. I ask that it may be made the unfinished business, not to interfere with the consideration of the immigration bill and the census bill, immediately upon the reconvening of the Senate on the 5th of January.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think there is no objection to the request, except as to its form. I do not understand that we can have more than one matter of unfinished business. I suppose the Senator can ask unanimous consent that after the two bills referred to have been disposed of, which it is understood should be acted upon in their order, then the Senator's bill should have the right of way in preference and be considered next. I suppose that is the substance of the request. To that I do not object. I do not, however, see how we can make anything the unfinished business after two bills shall have been disposed of.

Mr. PETTIGREW. My purpose was to make the bill the unfinished business after the immigration bill and the census bill were disposed of. But I made the request in the form I did for this reason: The immigration bill is to be voted upon on the 17th day of January. Probably in the meantime it will be but little considered, and there will be plenty of time before that date to dispose of this bill as well as the census bill. Therefore I ask to have the bill made the unfinished business, not to interfere with the consideration of those two measures.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, while I think it is a vicious habit that the Senate has got into of making certain bills the unfinished business several months in advance, I do not rise to object to the request made by the Senator from South Dakota, but simply to say that during the last Congress, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, I reported unanimously a bill for the further prevention of cruelty to animals in the District of Columbia. Upon solicitation from several Senators, saying that they were receiving letters from their constituents protesting against the passage of the bill, I allowed it to drift along and did not ask for the consideration of it. On the 13th day of May, 1897, the bill was again reported and is on the Calendar. I simply rise to say that, while I shall not object to the request of the Senator from South Dakota—because I never object to his requests—at an early day I shall move to take up that bill, which is Senate bill 1063, Calendar No., 136. I trust that when I ask the consideration of the bill it may not be objected to, but that that matter, which to my mind is extremely important—and a controverted matter, I will say, on the part of physicians, scientists, and humanitarians—may have a fair discussion and that we may have a vote of the Senate deciding whether or not that bill shall pass this body. That is all I care to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any further objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

PROTECTION OF FUR SEALS.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2612, which I regard as the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title of the bill will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2612) prohibiting the killing of fur seals in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill, and I think it proper to be considered at this time; but it is not the unfinished business, as I understand.

Mr. DAVIS. It is my understanding that it was made so by order of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has heretofore been read three times.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, this is a matter which, in the opinion of the Departments of State and the Treasury, demands immediate attention, and I send to the desk and ask to have read letters from the Secretaries of those respective Departments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letters referred to will be read, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 6, 1897.

SIR: By direction of the President I desire to bring to your attention the subject of the prohibition of citizens of the United States from engaging in the killing of fur seals in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean, with a view to such action by Congress as the subject may require.

The accompanying letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, to whose Department the administration of the seal islands pertains, sets forth the reasons which, from an administrative point of view, call for the legislation requested. In addition to these, there are strong diplomatic reasons why immediate action should be had. For the past three years, during which representations have been made by this Department to the British Government, protesting against the continuance of the indiscriminate slaughter of the seals by pelagic sealing, which was resulting in the destruction of a valuable industry of the United States, the answer has been made that British subjects were not the only participants in this practice and were not solely responsible for the decrease of the herd.

The Secretary of the Treasury has pointed out the effect of the award of the Paris Tribunal of Arbitration in nullifying the laws of the United States in their application to the high seas, and in making it lawful for citizens of the United States to engage in pelagic sealing. Since the regulations of that tribunal have been in force a comparatively small number of American vessels have engaged in killing seals at sea, but there is evidence to believe that a considerable American interest has been invested in the sealing vessels which sail from Canadian ports under the British flag. This condition of affairs has made it very embarrassing to the Government of the United States to press its demands upon Great Britain for a further restriction or the abolition of pelagic sealing.

A convention has recently been signed between the United States, Japan, and Russia providing for a joint prohibition of pelagic sealing for the coming season, on condition that Great Britain shall adhere to it.

The convention has in view the initiation of negotiations between the four powers for an agreement upon measures for the adequate protection of the seals and the restoration of the herds to their normal condition. These negotiations will be facilitated by the speedy passage of a law prohibiting American citizens from engaging in pelagic sealing. In view of these pending negotiations, and of the fact that another sealing season will begin toward the last of the present month, I urgently recommend that a bill to accomplish the purpose set forth in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury may, if possible, be enacted into law before the holiday recess.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN SHERMAN.

Hon. CUSHMAN K. DAVIS,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 3, 1897.

SIR: I desire to bring to your attention the subject of the killing of fur seals as pursued by American citizens in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean and Bering Sea. The practice is, in my opinion, inconsistent with the duty which the Government of the United States has assumed respecting the fur seals resorting to the Pribilof Islands.

Soon after the acquisition of Alaska, laws were enacted making it unlawful to kill any fur seal, either on the islands or in the waters of Alaska, except under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the killing of female seals was absolutely prohibited. When the privilege of taking seals on the Pribilof Islands under strict supervision was granted to the lessees for a valuable consideration, it became both the duty and the interest of the Government to afford all reasonable protection to the seal herd not only while on the islands, but as far as possible when absent therefrom The laws enacted for that purpose were construed to apply to all the waters of Bering Sea east of the line laid down in the treaty of cession from Russia, and for many years they afforded protection to the seals when on their migrations. When pelagic sealing began, the British Government questioned the power of the United States to enforce these laws beyond the 3-mile limit, and the Tribunal of Arbitration of Paris sustained the position of Great Britain.

That tribunal, however, recognizing the duty of the Governments concerned to protect and preserve the herd, adopted regulations respecting pelagic sealing which it thought would be adequate for the protection of the seals. Under these regulations it became lawful for American citizens and vessels to engage in pelagic sealing. The first year's experience in the application of the regulations proved that they would be entirely inadequate for the protection of the seals, but that, on the contrary, if pelagic sealing continued under them, the herd would be rapidly diminished and very soon be commercially exterminated. Each subsequent year has more fully demonstrated this conclusion. In the statement of facts recently agreed upon between the American, British, and Canadian experts it is shown that the herd has been diminished to about one-fifth of its normal condition and that it has already become so depleted that it is neither profitable to the lessees nor the pelagic sealers.

It is humiliating to have to acknowledge that American citizens and vessels have been active participants in this ruinous and shameless slaughter. In the judgment of our experts and those most competent to devise a remedy for this state of affairs, the continued decrease of the herd can be stopped and restoration to its normal state be brought about only by the total suspension of pelagic sealing. In this opinion I fully concur, and as the first step in the direction it should be made unlawful for citizens of the United States to engage in the business. Dr. David Starr Jordan, the accomplished naturalist, who, under appointment of the President, has during the past two years visited the Pribilof Islands and made a thorough study of the condition of the seals, has recommended the abolition of pelagic sealing as the only adequate means of protecting the herd. And he adds: "It would be well for America to lead the way in stopping pelagic sealing by restraining her own citizens, without waiting for the action of other nations. We can ask for protection with better grace when we have accorded unasked protection to others."

My predecessor, in recommending action by Congress, said: "I firmly believe the United States Government should prohibit pelagic sealing by its own citizens. I think it ought to go into this controversy with clean hands. It is an immoral pursuit; 75 per cent of the seals killed at sea are females; 75 per cent of the females killed are heavy with young or have pups on the islands. Their young thereupon die with them or starve on the islands. It is an inhuman butchery, and I believe it is the duty of the United States to stop it as regards at least its own citizens."

In accordance with the foregoing views, I have caused to be drafted a bill for enactment into a law by Congress, which, if it meets with your approval and does not in your opinion conflict with pending or prospective negotiations, I have to suggest may be brought to the attention of the proper committees of Congress for consideration and action. I have to add that in view of the fact that the next sealing season begins the last of December or early in January, it is of urgent importance that prompt action be taken, as otherwise American sealing vessels will have put to sea and they will participate in the further slaughter and destruction of the herd.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I desire to say but a few words upon this subject. The bill, as it appears from the correspondence just read, is in aid of pending negotiations to bring about restraint by international action upon the slaughter of the seal herd which has proceeded from year to year to such an extent that we are now upon the verge of the extinction of the herd. I understand the State Department feels great confidence that, in due process of time, with the aid that this bill, it is supposed, will give, it can bring about an international agreement among the four powers named in the correspondence which will subserve the desired result.

Mr. President, the situation in which our legislation upon this question has got, and which has made the passage of the pending bill necessary, is somewhat peculiar and not uninteresting. By section 1956 of the Revised Statutes it is provided that—

No person shall kill any otter, mink, marten, or fur seal, or other fur-bearing animal within the limits of Alaska Territory or in the waters thereof * * * and all vessels, etc., shall be forfeited.

Section 3 of the act to provide for the protection of the salmon fisheries of Alaska, approved March 2, 1889, provides:

That section 1956 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby declared to include and apply to all the dominion of the United States in the waters of Bering Sea; and it shall be the duty of the President, at a timely season in each year, to issue his proclamation and cause the same to be published * * * warning all persons against entering said waters for the purpose of violating the provisions of said section.

Now, Mr. President, those two articles of legislation were for a long time construed by the United States to have force and jurisdiction anywhere east of the marine line which was supposed to divide the waters of Bering Sea between the United States and Russia, and under that conception those statutes were enforced by seizures both of American and English vessels. They were enforced by admiralty decrees of the United States courts. Great Britain protested, and, without going into detail upon the subject of the Paris Tribunal, without stating or attempting to state in detail the conclusions to which that tribunal came, except to say that it utterly nullified and set aside our claim to property in the seals or jurisdiction over that portion of the broad seas as we claimed it, that tribunal held that we had no right to object to the taking and killing of seals outside of the 3-mile limit. The consequence was that in the case of La Ninfa, 75 Federal Reporter, page 513, the circuit court of appeals of the ninth judicial circuit held:

By the award of the arbitrators under the treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain (27 Stat., 948) it was settled that the United States have no exclusive jurisdiction in the waters of Bering Sea outside the ordinary 3-mile limit and no right of property in or protection over the fur seals frequenting the islands of the United States when found outside of such 3-mile limit. Therefore the act of March 2, 1889, declaring that Revised Statute, paragraph 1956, which forbids the killing of fur-bearing animals in Alaska and the waters thereof, shall apply to "all the dominion of the United States in the waters of Bering Sea," must be construed to mean the waters within 3 miles of the shores of Alaska.

As by the terms of the treaty of arbitration "the rights of the citizens and subjects of either country" were involved in the decision of the arbitrators, citizens of the United States have the same right to rely upon the award as to their rights under the statute as the citizens and subjects of Great Britain.

An award by arbitrators under a treaty between the United States and another nation, by which the contracting nations agree that the decision of the tribunal of arbitration shall be a final settlement of all questions submitted, becomes the supreme law of the land, and is as binding on the courts as an act of Congress.

Without endeavoring to discuss those legal propositions or to criticise or support the decision, it is enough to say that by a decision of the court, which is probably the court of last resort, the citizens of the United States, who before the award of the Paris Tribunal were prohibited from taking fur seals anywhere within the so-called and then thought territorial waters, are now by virtue of that award fully empowered and authorized to do so. So we have no statute, as this court has held in an admiralty case brought to condemn a vessel for violation of the provisions of the supposed statute, which prohibits the taking of fur seals by our own citizens.

Mr. SPOONER. What court is that?

Mr. DAVIS. The circuit court of appeals for the ninth judicial circuit.

That being the case, we are in the midst of negotiations wherein we are asking foreign powers, especially Great Britain, to put the seal of their condemnation upon the inherent immorality of this practice, and yet our own courts have decided favoring its legality. It is shameful to be obliged to confess it, the Department has been obliged to communicate to us information that our own citizens to some degree, perhaps as much as those of any other nation, for aught I know, are engaged in these very transactions which it is the end and scope of pending diplomatic negotiations to endeavor to stop.

That, I think, Mr. President, presents tersely the situation as it appeared to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which reported the bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I should like to ask whether the Committee on Foreign Relations has any information with regard to the condition of the seal herds during the year 1897? Can the chairman of the committee give me any information?

Mr. DAVIS. In what particular respect? That is putting a broad inquiry.

Mr. PETTIGREW. With regard to the number of seals, the number of young seals that starved, the number of seals killed in the open sea by Canadian poachers.

Mr. DAVIS. I am not able to give the Senator a bill of particulars upon the subject. It is a notorious fact that the seal herd is decreasing from year to year, and that extermination will follow unless we by legislation and we with other nations by diplomatic arrangement put a stop to the killing and slaughter of seals outside of the 60-mile limit, and within it, for that matter.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, with a certain amendment I am not opposed to the passage of the pending bill, but it does seem to me that the bill sent here by the State Department is a remarkable production after all that has occurred in connection with the seal business.

From 1870 to 1890 the Government of the United States received $6,000,000 of revenue from the seal herd of the Pribilof Islands. Since 1890 we have received but $300,000, and have paid out to protect those seals nearly $2,000,000. We have received no revenue at all since 1892, because the lessees of the islands refused to pay the rent for the reason that their catch has been reduced so enormously by the killing of the seals in the water by the Canadian fishermen.

In view of these facts, it is now proposed that the Canadians shall have a monopoly of destroying the seals and that we shall sit by and make it a criminal offense if our own people take any of the profits. We have tried to negotiate; we have constantly presented to Great Britain during the last three years the immorality of killing the mother seals at sea and allowing their young to starve to death, and yet she refuses to do anything whatever to remedy the difficulty. She refuses to negotiate with us even. She is insulting, evasive, according to the letter of the Secretary of State, which in more ancient times would have furnished sufficient cause for war, and we would have protected our property without waiting for negotiations.

On those islands in 1874 there were more than 4,000,000 seals, in 1890 there were 1,000,000 seals, and in 1896 there were 300,000 seals. In 1893, when we had a modus vivendi by which poaching was not allowed, 1,000 of the young seals starved to death upon the islands; but in 1894, when the splendid provisions of the Paris Tribunal came in force, 30,000 pups starved to death upon the islands while their mothers were killed at sea. The herd had recuperated a little during the year in which pelagic sealing was not allowed, so that in 1894 a greater number of female seals were killed at sea and a greater number of pups starved to death upon the islands.

Of course the first year proved the inefficiency of the provisions of the Paris Tribunal, and it proved conclusively that our commissioners were utterly ignorant of the habits of the fur seal, and that, although they filled the newspapers with loud acclaim as to the great skill with which they had outwitted Great Britain and secured provisions that would protect seal life forever and make those islands a wonderful nursery for the production of seals, still they had consented to provisions which were absolutely useless, as useless as though men could fish within the 3-mile limit. But it was found afterwards that the fishing banks were beyond the 60-mile limit and that the seals had to go beyond the 60-mile limit in order to secure food. In 1895, 21,000 pups starved to death upon the islands; in 1896, 27,000 pups starved to death upon the islands. Something like 600,000 female seals were killed at sea by the poachers.

Now, is this inhuman business to go on? Is it not humiliating enough that it has gone on so long, and is it not time that the United States Government stopped it, and stopped it at once? If we have got into a position by agreement, by the arbitration at Paris, by which we can not protect our property, the thing for us to do is to take the property ourselves, kill the seals as fast as they land upon the islands, and dispose of this question and of international complication.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON] asks me why not brand the seals. I think his allusion is in jest. It is true that an eminent scientist proposed that we should brand the seals. I wonder what success he had in 1897? I have tried to inquire at the State Department; I have tried to ascertain, but I can get no data as to the condition of the herd in 1897, nor as to his success in branding seals. It is absurd, silly, foolish, impractial, and impossible. How would the poacher know the seal was branded?

If he saw him in the water he would spear him and find out afterwards that he was branded. Further than that, the seal skin is not destroyed by branding. It is simply reduced in size. They spear the seals. The spear cut is sewed up, and if a furrier should obtain a skin whole, he would cut it and sew it in order to make it firm, in order to make it stay in shape. So with the brand. He would simply cut it out and sew it up. The fur would not be injured one particle. I have in my committee room two pieces of seal skin where that has been done, and any Senator can see that the fur is not injured one particle and would not be injured one particle. The skin is simply a little smaller. However, we hear no more about branding. The State Department have not proposed an appropriation for branding. They have evidently abandoned that absurd and ridiculous position.

It is agreed on all sides that the herd will entirely disappear—I think it has practically disappeared now—if pelagic sealing is continued. Professor Jordan last year said the only possible way to preserve the herd was to stop, absolutely, sealing in the water, because 75 per cent of the seals taken were female seals.

It seems to me we ought to provide an amendment to the pending bill by which, if Great Britain does not, by the 1st of next June, enter into an agreement to stop pelagic sealing, we will take the life of every seal that lands upon the islands. Some one says that is inhuman. But, Mr. President, we kill 30,000 seals on the islands every year. We have a statute to regulate the killing. It is inhuman business. It is rather revolting. It is not a very good business for the Government of the United States to be engaged in.

I would rather see the herd destroyed and have this great Government go out of the killing business; but it is no more inhuman—in fact it is less inhuman—to kill all the seals than to kill 30,000 and let twenty-five or thirty thousand young seals starve to death upon the islands. These young seals, according to the report, live from three to five weeks, moaning and wailing, hunting over the rookeries for their mothers, who are gone forever, and finally die. What can be more humiliating for this country than that?

I therefore offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in as an additional section at the end of line 7, page 3.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after line 7, on page 3, the following, as a new section:

SEC. 10. That if Great Britain shall not enter into an agreement with the United States which shall be effectual in the judgment of the President for preserving the Alaskan seal herd on or before June 1, 1898, then the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to take and kill each and every fur seal, male and female, as it may be found on the Pribilof Islands, the skins of said seals to be sold by him to the best advantage with regard to time and place of sale as he may elect, and the proceeds thereof covered into the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That all needful expenses incident to the thorough performance of this work of killing seals, preserving and transportation of skins, erection of necessary buildings, employment of labor, care of the seal island and Pribilof natives, incurred by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be paid by him out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated: Provided also, That nothing in the Revised Statutes, sections Nos. 1960 and 1961, contained shall prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from exercising the authority herein conferred upon him to take and kill said seals, but otherwise said sections shall remain in full force and operation.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I desire here under existing conditions to enter my protest against the conception or the execution of the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota. That Great Britain or her subjects propose or are engaged in a course of extermination of this most interesting animal which shocks humanity is no reason or justification why this great Government should sink below the worst we can conceive of Great Britain from what she has done and enter upon an act of atrocious butchery of animal life unexampled in history. Because a foreign nation or its subject is doing wrong, shall we, in our collective capacity as a nation, commit a crime? Let us stand through all this business with clean hands, and when we are assured by two Departments of this Government that there is a prospect of negotiations which will result favorably in arresting the wholesale extermination by a concert of measures among four great powers, which in ten years will restore the herd to its pristine numbers, I think it is unwise, to say the least, to endeavor to embarrass those negotiations by any threat in terrorem such as that proposed in the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

He proposes the entire annihilation of the herd, killing in one season, I think, 170,000 seals, by or under the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, with no means provided as to how the terrible execution shall be inflicted. It would take an enormous force of butchers to do it. It would take an enormous force of skilled men to cure and provide and care for the skins, and after all that had been done one of the most interesting animals in creation would have been obliterated entirely.

Mr. President, it deeply concerns, from a business, practical point of view, this Government, that every means shall be resorted to for the purpose of protecting the herd. We gave Russia $7,200,000 for Alaska. We have received as compensation growing out of the seal business over $6,000,000 and we have received in revenue from seal skins, cured and dressed, mostly in London, and thence imported into this country, over $11,000,000, and we are told by scientific men, we are told by the Department to whom negotiations of this character are intrusted, that there is a probability that this long and distressing difficulty between the nations and their subjects will be brought to an end by negotiation.

I send to the desk an extract from a letter of Professor Jordan, of which I desire the Secretary to read the part marked.

The Secretary read as follows:

Within the past two years it has several times been proposed that we should settle the fur-seal question once for all by the slaughter of the entire herd on its breeding grounds. It is scarcely necessary to point out that this course of action would not accomplish the desired end. As the animals are never all present at one time on the islands, a remnant would be left, which in time would revive the herd, and with it the whole question. In the meantime every objection which has been urged against pelagic sealing would be justly chargeable against such a slaughter. It would be necessary to lie in wait for the gravid females and kill them as they came on land to give birth to their young or to provide them with nourishment. The young must be slaughtered wantonly or else left to starve. The whole proposition is an abominable one, without a single redeeming feature.

The fur seal is the noblest of all the mammals of the sea. From the naturalist's point of view it is one of the most interesting forms of life on the earth. From the commercial point of view it is one of the most valuable. Unlike the buffalo, the elk, the stag, and like animals, it occupies territory that can not be used for any other purpose. Where the former animals once roamed great cities have grown up, but the haunts of the fur seal would be deserted for all time if their inhabitants were destroyed.

Though sadly reduced in numbers, a nucleus of the fur-seal herd is still left. Under favorable conditions it can be restored. The Pribilof herd once yielded 100,000 skins annually, worth $2,000,000 or more, and without injury to itself. This would represent a cash value of $25,000,000. If properly protected it will again reach this value. These figures represent a sum too great to be thrown away in childish spite. To slaughter the fur-seal herd ourselves because its preservation is beset with diplomatic difficulties, in which the fault has not all been on one side, would be a confession of impotence unworthy of a civilized nation. It would transfer to the United States alone and for all time the odium for the destruction of the fur-seal herds.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I do not care to go into any discussion concerning the Paris Tribunal, or to make any remarks, except to say that our country was most ably and patriotically represented before that great court. That the results of its decision have not been all that could be expected is not the blame of the United States. We are dealing here at this moment with a practical and immediate question concerning which no recrimination as to what has taken place or has not taken place in the past can do one particle of good. The Department of State and the Treasury Department, dealing immediately with this question, deem legislation of this character advantageous and most propitious for our interests. Let us give it to them in the way that it is asked, and the responsibility will be on them.

I do not think it is wise to insert in legislation of this character a threat to Great Britain or a limitation upon our diplomatic agencies, under the influence of which any self-respecting foreign power would do as I think Great Britain would do in the presence of such a threat, simply refuse to accede to the beneficial negotiations and results for which we all so earnestly long.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota will not prevail. To my mind it would be a confession on the part of this Government of great weakness and impotence to say that because we can not control pelagic sealing, and the Government of Great Britain has not yet consented to do that which it should do in cooperating with us to prevent pelagic sealing, we will exterminate the whole herd of seals.

It is unbecoming, in my opinion, for this great nation to place such a law upon our statute book, and I for one should be ashamed to see it there. Let us by negotiation, by diplomacy, and by all the arts of fair dealing known to business men, continue to do as we have been doing.

Only a few weeks since a commission represented by Russia, Japan, and this Government met in this city. England was invited to participate with us, and at the last moment she sent a representative here. In that conference this whole question was discussed, and it is under consideration now by the proper department of our Government.

There is in the communication which has been read here to-day sufficient evidence to my mind to show that it is our duty to pass the bill without amendment and wait for further developments. As well might my friend from South Dakota, if he were engaged in the business of raising cattle or sheep, because the Indians had run away with a part of his drove and he had lost a portion of them, and because he could not prevent the Indians from doing so, plead in his own legislature for the extermination of his cattle and sheep. I do not believe the Senator from South Dakota is in earnest when he proposes such an outrageous proposition as this suggests itself to my mind to be.

After we acquired the Pribilof Islands, from 1870 to 1890 we received over $9,000,000 in revenue from those islands for the skins of fur seals. Since then we have received some two or three million dollars, and the last contract was awarded to a commercial company of California. I wish to say parenthetically that it is as substantial and reliable financially as any commercial company in this country. There has been some question as to their liability. They were to pay, I believe, $60,000 per annum and $9 per head for each seal skin taken. There has been some question as to their liability for the number of seals taken, as the maximum fixed by the Treasury Department was not that which they had been led to believe by the proposal would be given. But that question is under consideration by the courts. Two Attorneys-General of the Government, Attorney-General Olney and Attorney-General Harmon, gave different opinions, and it was deemed wise to certify it to the courts, there to be decided. The Attorney-General has advanced it upon the calendar, and at an early date this question will be adjudicated, and whatever is due the Government will be adjusted and paid.

It is not a fair proposition to say that it cost us last year $2,000,000 or any other sum particularly to control the Bering Sea. We have revenue cutters that are manned and supported by the Government to protect the revenues of the Government. The revenue cutters the Rush, the Bear, the Corwin, and one other cutter would necessarily be engaged on the Pacific coast. They are plying their vocation. It is their mission to guard the ports and patrol the coast of California, Oregon, Washington, and Alaska, and their expenses would not have been one dollar less had they not patrolled Bering Sea to guard against pelagic sealing.

But I shall not weary the Senate by discussing this proposition. I am charitable enough to believe that my friend from South Dakota does not want to have his amendment adopted. If he does, I am sure that a majority of the Senate does not, and that we will pass the bill as it is presented to us by our Committee on Foreign Relations, with full confidence that the future will develop a plan by which the seals of the Bering Sea will be preserved to commerce and to our people, and there will be no stain upon this Government's honor by placing upon our statute book a confession that we are unable to control this industry of our country.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, the Senator from California is certainly very much mistaken if he thinks I am not in earnest in pressing this amendment. I believe it should be adopted, and I believe if adopted it will result in the preservation of the seal herd. But if England will refuse after the passage of the amendment to make the necessary regulations for the preservation of seal life, then we shall dispose of the whole question. It is no more inhuman and but little more trouble to kill the 175,000 seals than to kill the 30,000 which we will kill under the contract with the Alaska Commercial Company. It is less inhuman to take the life of every seal.

The proposition is not that we shall kill the pups, for we will take the lives of the seals as fast as they will land. Otherwise we allow them to land, their pups are born, and we sit as a Government, as we have sat for the last three years, and see their mothers killed at sea and their children starved to death, and then Senators rise here and say that this is an inhuman proposition. Is it more inhuman to kill the mother and thereby prevent the starvation of the pup than to wait until the child is born and then kill the mother and let the child starve to death, living for three or four weeks? Professor Jordan worked himself into a tremendous passion over the question of killing the seals, leaving out of consideration altogether his own report that 27,000 pups starved to death upon the island in 1896.

If I had a herd of sheep 4,000,000 in number in 1874, and they had shrunk to 1,000,000 in 1890, and 175,000 last year, and I was absolutely powerless, without receiving any revenue from them at all, to prevent the Indians or the Canadians or anybody else from destroying the mothers, allowing the lambs to starve to death on my hands, I would exercise good business prudence by killing the whole herd and get the little benefit there was to be had out of them. So would any man who has business common sense. If we want to apply to this proposition——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from South Dakota allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall be very glad to hear the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator regard an agreement with Great Britain on the subject as desirable, if practicable?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not think it is practicable. I do not believe we will secure it.

Mr. SPOONER. That does not answer my question.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Do I regard it as desirable?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Has the Senator the remotest notion that any self-respecting government would enter into a negotiation on the subject with the United States if Congress should adopt this amendment declaring that if Great Britain did not enter into a specific agreement with us by a certain date we would destroy the subject-matter of the proposed convention?

Mr. PETTIGREW. We have tried for four years, presenting the subject in every phase possible, to secure an agreement from Great Britain to preserve this seal life. In the face of the barbarity and the starvation of the young seals, Great Britain absolutely refuses even to enter into negotiations upon the subject, refusing to participate this year in the conference of the three nations that was held. Therefore I say if there is no hope of Great Britain entering into an agreement, we should dispose of the whole question, which is one of international irritation, by taking the property which belongs to us, and taking it at once. This is the position I take with regard to the subject.

It is rather interesting that the three nations—Russia, Japan, and the United States—met here in conference upon this subject and agreed to stop pelagic sealing provided Great Britain was willing. We have got to a point where we sent a commission to Europe where it spent the summer to have Great Britain become willing to let us manage our own financial affairs. Now Great Britain comes in again, and we are to wait until Great Britain is willing before we can take care of our own property.

We are waiting for Great Britain to be willing before we accord justice to the murdered patriots of Cuba. Mr. President, the only reason why the Administration does nothing with regard to Cuba is because the moneyed interest not of this country, for we owe everybody and nobody owes us, but the moneyed interest of Lombard street has the Spanish bonds, and they will not be quite as valuable if we should interfere. Therefore they are able to reach this Government, and therefore we will not interfere and we will do nothing for Cuba until Great Britain is willing. So it is that we are governed from the other side of the water. We can not form a financial system necessary to the preservation of the prosperity of the toiling masses of this country until Great Britain is willing, and we send a commission to fawn at her feet and beg of the crooked-nose Jews of Lombard street for a chance to govern ourselves on that subject. And now we can not have our property in Bering Sea until Great Britain is ready. I do not know that anyone will come down with a message from any of the Departments saying we shall not interfere with Cuba until Great Britain is willing, but that is the reason why we do not interfere, and all there is to it.

In 1896 the House of Representatives passed a bill to provide for doing just what my amendment proposes.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from South Dakota allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. Am I correct in my memory that the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body in the last Congress reported a bill somewhat similar to the provision now offered as an amendment by the Senator?

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is just what I was coming to.

Mr. WHITE. Very well.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In 1896 the House of Representatives passed a bill to provide exactly what my amendment calls for, in order to kill the seals then. I will read what the House report says:

> If, however, we fail in this, as we have failed under present conditions, notwithstanding we have been urging Great Britain for more than a year to unite with us in measures to preserve seal life, then considerations of mercy as well as of economy and justice demand that we should stop the further cruel starvation of thousands of seal pups by taking what seals are left and disposing of their skins and covering into the Treasury the proceeds, which would probably reach $5,000,000.

Now the seal herd has shrunk to 175,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 112.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid aside informally and that the Senator from South Dakota may be allowed to proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection made to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. ALLEN. What is the request?

Mr. FRYE. That the unfinished business be laid aside informally in order that the Senator from South Dakota may proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to laying the unfinished business temporarily aside? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator from South Dakota to yield to me for just a moment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will conclude what I have to say in five minutes, and then the Senator from Nebraska can be heard, I presume.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The House passed a bill in 1896 providing for the killing of the seals and making a saving of $5,000,000. We have run along ever since and our herd has been reduced to 175,000, according to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. By next summer, if pelagic sealing is permitted, there will be practically no seals whatever left, for of the 175,000 only a few are females and very few are young seals. Very large numbers of them die of old age. To save the disgrace and the shame of this performance by allowing the pups to starve to death in those islands the bill was passed by the House, and it came to the Senate March 4, 1896. It was reported by Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, who submitted a report, which says:

> The Committee on Foreign Relations have considered House bill 3206, and report that the bill ought to pass.
> The reasons given for favorable action by the House Committee on Ways and Means commend themselves to your committee, and are hereto annexed.

I therefore ask the Secretary to read the House report.

The Secretary read as follows:

> The Committee on Foreign Relations have considered House bill 3206, and report that the bill ought to pass.
>
> The reasons given for favorable action by the House Committee on Ways and Means commend themselves to your committee, and are hereto annexed.
> [House Report No. 451, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]
> The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3206) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska, and for other purposes," have considered the same, and beg leave to report:
> In order to prevent the extermination of fur seals, which will soon take place unless prompt measures can be taken to prevent pelagic sealing, this bill authorizes the President to invite Great Britain, Russia, and Japan, or any of them, to unite with the United States in the appointment of a joint commission to investigate the present condition and habits of the fur-seal herd in the North Pacific Ocean and in the Bering Sea, and the method of slaughtering the same, with the result of such slaughter, and report what further regulations, if any, are necessary for its preservation, with a view to their adoption and enforcement by the countries uniting in creating such commission.
> Pending this investigation, the President is authorized to conclude a modus vivendi with said Governments, or any of them, providing for such new or additional regulations as may be deemed expedient for the preservation of the fur-seal herd, said modus vivendi to terminate January 1, 1898.
> If, however, the President finds himself unable to secure the cooperation of Great Britain, especially, in securing the modus vivendi authorized by this bill, so as to protect and preserve the Alaskan seal herd for this year's sealing season, then the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to take each and every fur seal on the Pribilof Islands and to sell the skins of said seals as he may elect, and to cover the proceeds into the Treasury.
> The necessity for this course arises from the fact that the Alaskan fur-seal herd is being rapidly exterminated by pelagic sealing vessels—mainly Canadian—which follow the seal herd as it moves along our Pacific coast in the spring and enter Bering Sea at the end of the close season in August, when they are free, under the ineffectual regulations adopted by the Paris Tribunal, to use the spear—more deadly than the shotgun—in killing, outside of the 60-mile zone, the seals that frequent these waters in pursuit of food. As these seals are mainly females that have brought forth their young on the Pribilof Islands, the killing of the mother seals results in the starvation of the young upon the land and the inevitable rapid extinction of the fur-seal herd.
> The rapidity of the decline of the valuable herd which annually resorts to the Pribilof Islands of Alaska, mainly on account of pelagic sealing, will be seen when it appears that in 1874 this herd numbered about 4,693,000. In 1890 the herd had been reduced to 1,039,000, and at the close of the season in 1895 to about 175,500—44,000 seals, mostly females, having been killed during the last season by pelagic sealers, and about 30,000 pups having died of starvation in consequence of the killing of the mother seals.
> One year ago it was the estimate of experts that if all killing of seals had been stopped then it would take five years to restore it to its former numbers. It is now estimated that if regulations can be secured before the next season opens, the herd can be restored in ten years. If, however, the pelagic sealers are permitted to avail themselves of another season's opportunities for slaughter under the ineffectual regulations of the Paris Tribunal, it is believed by experts that the herd will be so nearly exterminated as to make it very difficult to restore it; and that if pelagic sealing continues, within five years not only the Alaskan herd, but also the Russian and Japanese herds, will be well-nigh extinguished.
> When it is borne in mind that our Government received almost $6,000,000 between 1870 and 1890 from the lessees who were given the exclusive privilege of annually killing 100,000 male seals above 1 year of age, and in 1890, under the new lease, $299,673, but in 1891 only $46,749, in 1892 only $23,972, and since 1892 it has received nothing (notwithstanding $550,000 is due) because of a claim of the lessees for a reduction of rental which awaits determination by the courts, it will be seen that the Treasury is being deprived of a very valuable source of revenue by the operations of the pelagic sealers.
> Not only this, but the Government expended in 1894 about $450,000 in a vain attempt to prevent the killing of seals in Bering Sea by enforcing the inefficient regulations of the Paris Tribunal.
> It will be seen, therefore, that unless Great Britain can be persuaded to unite with this country in so modifying and enlarging the regulations adopted by the Paris Tribunal—for Russia and Japan are ready to join us—the Canadian pelagic sealers will, within five years, completely exterminate not only the Alaskan, but the Russian seal herds, and deprive this country of a valuable source of revenue and the world of a great boon. And inasmuch as all these seal skins go to London to be prepared and dyed, giving employment there to nearly 50,000 persons, even Great Britain herself will be deprived of a valuable source of income for her own people.
> It is believed that it is Canada that is standing in the way and holding back Great Britain from cooperating with us in the preservation of the seal herd, and that when Canada sees that we propose to take summary measures to end not only the inhumanity that consigns thousands of young seals to slow starvation, but also the farce by which we are expending large sums of money to police Bering Sea, practically to aid her pelagic sealers in the work of exterminating seals, she will no longer endeavor to prevent England from uniting with us in efficient measures to save the seal herds to the world.
> If, however, we fail in this, as we have failed under present conditions, notwithstanding we have been urging Great Britain for more than a year to unite with us in measures to preserve seal life, then considerations of mercy as well as of economy and justice demand that we should stop the further cruel starvation of thousands of seal pups by taking what seals are left and disposing of their skins and covering into the Treasury the proceeds, which would probably reach $5,000,000.
> Your committee therefore unanimously recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is my opinion that if we had passed the House bill two years ago, we would have settled this entire seal controversy. If we should pass the amendment now, I believe it would be a settlement of the controversy. I believe that the thousands of people engaged in London in handling the skins will demand to be heard the very moment they find that the industry is to be absolutely destroyed unless proper preservation of seal life is accorded on the part of the British Government.

I do not think that we are in a position to urge Great Britain longer to negotiate. We have reached a point in this controversy where it is a sacrifice of national pride and national honor to again approach them on the subject.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have not, perhaps, given the particular act proposed the attention which its importance merits, but there are some matters about it that I think ought to receive perhaps a little consideration.

We were in a position a short time ago something like this: Great Britain claimed that we had no right to interfere with the pelagic enterprises of her subjects. Our own people were taken in the act of capturing seals, and vessels were libeled in our courts. Afterwards it so turned out that we paid or are to pay Great Britain heavy damages for doing the very acts which are thereby shown to have been valid, and for which we provide for the punishment of our own citizens.

I thoroughly agree that it is inhuman to provide for the slaughter of the seal herd. It may not be of particular importance as to how that slaughter is to be effected, although, speaking from a humanitarian standpoint, perhaps death should be made as easy as possible. It may be that the Senators from New York would favor electrocution, in which Ohio probably joins, and the Senators from Wisconsin would be in favor, no doubt, of imprisonment for life.

However this may be, our position at this date can be thus stated: England declines to do anything to prevent the slaughter of the seal herd. We are about to pass a law prohibiting our citizens from engaging in that pastime hereafter, so that it will be illicit for American citizens and entirely virtuous for English subjects.

If the Senators in charge of the bill can show the Senate that the passage thereof will facilitate the bringing about of a condition of things which will compel Great Britain to enact similar laws and the Dominion to adopt similar regulations, I shall favor it. If not, why not let us preserve the status quo? Why can we not agree with Great Britain that we will legislate, making the taking of seals under the conditions designated in this bill penal, but that we expect of her a similar regulation and are compelled to wait until she enacts it?

It is not important as to the order in which the bills are passed. If an agreement of any character is made between the powers looking to that end, we will, of course, conclude, as we should, that Great Britain will act in good faith, and we can proceed at once to pass such a measure. But I do not understand that there is anyone authorized to say that negotiations have reached such a point as to justify the conclusion that an act of this sort is contemplated on the part of Great Britain, and until that condition of affairs is reached, it seems to me that we ought not to legislate at all upon this topic.

Now, Mr. President, it is true, as the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] has stated, that the Committee on Foreign Relations at the last session brought in a bill in favor of destroying the seal herd; but it must not be forgotten that the Committee on Foreign Relations during the last session was more bellicose than that same committee is at the present session. Now we have a modified and, it seems to me, a more proper proposition here; but I object to passing any bill, as I have said, covering the subject at all, unless the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], or some other equally advised Senator upon this floor, can inform us that there is at least reasonable ground for the belief that our legislation will be followed by similar enactments abroad. Otherwise the passage of this bill will retard instead of accelerating foreign legislation, because the British Columbia sealers will say, "It is a crime for an American to engage in this enterprise; the individuals who may participate in it are restricted practically to our own subjects, and let us enjoy the benefit of that which the American people are not allowed to enjoy."

Under these conditions, Mr. President, I think we ought to look at this matter with considerable care—I have no doubt the distinguished Senator in charge of this bill has stated here fully all that he is advised of in the matter—and for that reason I think the subject ought not to be taken up at this time. Whenever we are informed by reliable or authoritative sources that this is but one step in the several that are to be taken to prevent the destruction of the seal herd, I am in favor of acting. To pass this bill, however, would not save seal life, but it would turn over its destruction, and the enjoyment of whatever profits may arise from such destruction, to a single nation. We ought to hesitate, it seems to me, Mr. President, before we legislate against our own people in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The question before the Senate is on the adoption of the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. WHITE. It appears to me that this is a bill of a character requiring the presence of a full Senate. I do not care to ask for a roll call if it will interfere with anything else.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator can ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WHITE. That is just what I suggested, if it will not disclose the want of a quorum.

Mr. FRYE. The call of the roll will disclose a quorum, I think.

Mr. WHITE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. WHITE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], but my impression is that if present he would vote for this bill, as it comes from the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which he is a member. I will, therefore, take the liberty of voting, and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY], who is absent. Were he present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RAWLINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I inquire whether the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has not voted.

Mr. TURPIE. Then I withhold my vote, as I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. WELLINGTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CAFFERY. I have a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, but I should vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. LINDSAY. I inquire whether the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. LINDSAY. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I inquire if the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am paired with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote. I should vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. MARTIN. I have a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BACON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. Under our agreement, either has the right to vote, in his discretion, upon matters not political. This not being political, I exercise that discretion, and vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I am requested to announce the pair of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN]. Both are absent.

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—37.

Allen,	Deboe,	Lodge,	Roach,
Allison,	Fairbanks,	McBride,	Sewell,
Bacon,	Faulkner,	Mason,	Shoup,
Carter,	Frye,	Mills,	Spooner,

So the bill was passed.

RAILWAY ACROSS OMAHA AND WINNEBAGO RESERVATIONS.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask permission to call up for present consideration Senate bill 2508.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent of the Senate, without displacing the unfinished business, except temporarily, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2508) granting the right to the Omaha Northern Railway Company to construct a railway across, and establish stations on, the Omaha and Winnebago reservations, in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLEN. I will state for the benefit of Senators that this bill grants the right of way to construct a railway across the Omaha and Winnebago reservations.

Mr. HOAR. I merely wish to ask one question. Was this bill unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir; and the bill is in the form adopted by that committee for the protection of the Indian rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill the title of which has been read?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment in section 1, line 5, after the word "its," to insert "successors and;" so as to make the section read:

That there is hereby granted to the Omaha Northern Railway Company, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Nebraska, and its successors and assigns, the right of way for the construction of its proposed railroad through the Omaha and Winnebago Indian reservations, in said State. Such right of way shall be 50 feet in width on each side of the center line of said railroad, and said company shall also have the right to take from the lands adjacent to the line of said railroad material, stones, and earth necessary for the construction of said railroad; also grounds adjacent to such right of way for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, not to exceed in amount 200 feet in width and 3,000 feet in length for each station, to the extent of three stations within the limits of said reservations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAYMENT OF CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYEES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the joint resolution from the House of Representatives (H. Res. 103) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1897, on the 17th day of said month; which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and instructed to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of December, 1897, on the 17th day of said month.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the usual resolution passed by the two Houses preceding the holidays. I think it hardly necessary to refer it to the Committee on Appropriations, unless some Senator desires that that shall be done.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the joint resolution will be now considered.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Missouri is familiar with the practice in regard to such resolutions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope it will be considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TWELFTH AND SUBSEQUENT CENSUSES.

Mr. QUAY. I move, if there is no pressing legislative business before the Senate, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion. I understood from the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] whom I do not see here that he was going to call up the census bill; and on that I desire to make a few remarks. The arrangement is all made.

Mr. QUAY. I have no objection to withdrawing the motion for the purpose of accommodating the Senator from Massachusetts, if he desires me to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania withdraws the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. QUAY. I give notice that I shall renew my request immediately upon the expiration of the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 112) to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I agreed with the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] whom I saw a moment ago but do not see now that that bill should be temporarily laid aside in order that the census bill might be taken up.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, I understood that an arrangement had been made of the character stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the census bill, having been considered during the time occupied by the Senator from Massachusetts, thereafter we should proceed to the ordinary business of the Senate, and put over the census matter until after the holidays. The Senator from Montana, I observe, is in his place, and he will no doubt state the agreement.

Mr. CARTER. It was understood, I believe, that the census bill, Senate bill No. 94, would be taken up at present for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to submit certain remarks which he desires to submit at this time. The understanding was that thereafter the matter should go over until after the holidays, as stated by the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the bill (S. 94) to provide for the Twelfth and subsequent censuses may be taken up, temporarily displacing the unfinished business, which is the immigration bill. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. PETTUS. Taken up when?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At present, for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to make some remarks upon the bill, when it will be postponed until after the holidays.

Mr. PETTUS. I understood the Senate had voted to go into executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] withdrew the motion.

Mr. PETTUS. I did not know that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 94) to provide for the Twelfth and subsequent censuses.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in regard to the third section of the census bill, which, in the report of the committee, it is proposed to strike out. The third section of the bill as introduced provided for the appointment of the officers created by the bill under the existing civil-service law; that is, that they should be taken from the existing registers of the civil service. The present amendment proposes to do away with that, and leave the appointment to the director of the census after such examination as he may choose to prescribe.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to my colleague that he read the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I have the amendment here, and at the request of my colleague I will read it. It is proposed to strike out the section putting these various officers under the act of 1883 and instead of that provision to insert:

SEC. 3. That the chief clerk, disbursing clerk, and the chief statisticians provided for in the preceding section, and all other employees authorized by this act below the assistant director of the census, shall be appointed according to the discretion of the director of the census, subject to such examination as said director may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, prescribe, and not otherwise.

That is the amendment which is proposed. As I have said, that is making the appointments for the coming census on the same plan as that by which they were made under the last census.

I am quite aware, Mr. President, that just at this stage of existence it is not fashionable to say anything in behalf of the civil-service system as it exists under the act of 1883. On the contrary, the fashion at present is to assail it on all possible occasions; but I have always been a friend of that system, and I do not think it is any less desirable now than I have considered it in past years.

Mr. Cleveland, at the close of his term, made an enormous extension of the classified service, putting, I think, some 40,000 places within the classification. Those places had all been filled without examination—I think practically all—by members of Mr. Cleveland's party, and then they were put under the civil-service law, and protected to that extent against change.

The result of that action is naturally to put a great strain upon the law when the opposite party comes in immediately after the extension.

The present President of the United States, however, always a friend of the law, has adhered to it strictly and has dealt with it at the beginning instead of at the end of his Administration, as has been the practice of his predecessors, and in so doing I think he has shown both wisdom and courage. I do not propose to enter now into the general reasons which seem to me make the reformed system of the civil service very essential to good government.

The chief reasons which I have always found for this reform are the degradation which the patronage system brings to politics, the injury it causes to public life, and the enormous burden it puts upon public men, imposing duties which do not properly belong to them and which impair their public usefulness. All these are arguments with which everyone who has considered the subject is familiar, and I do not mean to dwell upon them now. Nor do I undertake to defend the merit system as an ideal or absolutely perfect system. Very few things of human manufacture, I think, are perfect. Certainly the reform system of the civil service is not, and the argument which is usually made against it is apparently based on the idea that its defenders consider it absolutely perfect.

The real proposition in regard to the present system—the merit system, as it is called—is that it is a great deal better than the patronage system, and that to return to the patronage system would be a very retrograde movement. The real vice of the old system is the utter irresponsibility of appointments. If the head of a bureau or of a Department could select his own subordinates, there would be little or no need of competitive examinations or of any artificial system to select them for him, but as a matter of fact no head of a Department or bureau does select his own subordinates, when it is left to him to do so, without civil-service examination. They are selected for him by Senators, by members of the House, and by other persons not responsible for the work of the bureau or the Department. If the man responsible for the work of the bureau or the Department selected his own subordinates, he would certainly select good ones, for his own credit and reputation would be bound up in the success of his administration.

But when they are forced upon him from outside, then we have the anomalous and injurious condition of one set of persons selecting subordinates and another being responsible for their work. Into these general considerations, quite sufficient in themselves to justify and more than justify the present system, I shall not enter further.

In what I have to say about this section in the census bill I desire to place my argument purely on the ground of business, and show that it is a better and a cheaper method of administration—cheaper to the people and more economical in the expenditure of the people's money—to take the clerks and subordinates from the registers of the civil service, under such examinations as the director of the census may request, than to have them appointed as the amendment proposes, which would result in making them subjects of patronage. I think this is a proposition susceptible of proof, and I desire, first, to ask the attention of the Senate to the statement of the superintendent of the last census, Mr. Robert P. Porter. He has an article on this subject in the current number of the North American Review, and I wish to read one or two extracts from what he says. He enumerates the faults of the present system, and one of them, he says, is—

> Placing upon the shoulders of the Superintendent, whose mind should be fully occupied with his experts in planning the work, the responsibility of the appointment of an office force of several thousand clerks.

He then inquires how those defects may be remedied, and says:

> First, by making the census a permanent office of the Government, and applying to it precisely the same rules and regulations as to the employment of clerical help as are in vogue in other Departments. If this were done, special civil-service examinations might be held for the work prior to the time the clerks would be needed, and the Census Office would then have a sufficiently large eligible list to draw from. In 1890 I accepted civil-service examinations of the higher grades, but that did not do away with the necessity of examining 2,700 clerks in the office; and this, with the work of appointment, literally took up all the time of the Superintendent, whose mind should have been free for his purely statistical duties.

Then lower down on the same page he says:

> It will be better, in my opinion, to draw the clerks for the Twelfth Census from the classified service, but chiefly because by so doing it will strengthen the faith of the public in the census.

And then again—

He says—

> why transform the Census Office at its busiest season into an examination department for clerks, and the director of a vast scientific investigation into a dispenser of political patronage? It is simply unjust to such an official. Having passed through the ordeal once, I am satisfied that the other way is more practical, and in the end will be better for all concerned.

Then, at the conclusion of the article, Mr. Porter says:

> If Congress expects an intelligent census it must not compel its director to chase all over the United States after mortgages on the one hand, and on the other to be chased morning, noon, and night by applicants for office.

That is the testimony of the Superintendent who carried on the last census.

I have here a letter from Colonel Wright, the Commissioner of the Department of Labor. I saw him quoted as having said that the work of taking the last census cost $2,000,000 more than it would have cost if the appointments in the Census Office had been made under civil-service rules, and I wrote to ask if he had made the statement; and if so, on what facts he had based it. He has replied in a communication which I shall ask leave to print in full at the end of my remarks; and I merely desire now to call attention to some of the statements he makes. He says:

> I should have very much preferred that the statement made relative to the saving of at least $2,000,000 could have rested as a matter of opinion, but as you have called for the data on which I base this opinion, I shall furnish them. In doing this I am obliged to make comparison between the work of the Department of Labor and that of the Eleventh Census Office, and thus place myself in an attitude which may subject me to some captious criticism. The comparison I make is one between systems and not between administrations under the two systems, for in the case in hand, while at the head of the Department of Labor, I was for four years in charge of the Federal Census Office. Thus whatever comparison is made involves in some degree my own administration of the Census Office as well as that of the Department of Labor.
> The work of this Department—

That is, the Department of Labor—> and that of the Census Office is of the same general grade. The facts on which reports are based are gathered by enumerators or special agents in both cases, correspondence, as a rule, being used simply for purposes of explanation or verification when needed.

Then he goes on to show how the cost of production in the Department of Labor and the census can be compared, and he gives a table which is the basis for the statement he made. The cost per thousand nonpareil ems of printed matter, exclusive of printing, engraving, and binding, was $17.22 in the Department of Labor and $47.97 in the census. The total disbursements, exclusive of printing, engraving, and binding, in the Department of Labor were $1,369,777.26—that is, from April 1, 1889, to June 30, 1897—and for the census it cost $10,016,677.68. The total disbursements, exclusive of the salaries and expenses of the field force and of printing, engraving, and binding, were $875,000 for the Department of Labor and $5,670,000 for the census.

Colonel Wright says:

> There are two basic comparisons in the foregoing table. The first relates to the total cost in the two offices per 1,000 nonpareil ems of matter, the cost of printing, engraving, and binding being excluded. Under this comparison the cost of production in the Census Office was 178.57 per cent greater than in the Department of Labor. The objection may be raised that this comparison includes the great cost of the force of enumerators and special agents employed in the census; so another comparison, the second one in the table, has been made, showing the cost per 1,000 nonpareil ems of matter, exclusive of the total cost of collecting the material in both offices and of the cost of printing, engraving, and binding the results; in other words, this comparison is based purely on the cost of compiling the material after it was collected. By this comparison it is seen that the cost per 1,000 nonpareil ems of matter was 146.68 per cent greater in the Census Office than in the Department of Labor.

Then he goes on to analyze the figures in detail, and quotes from Mr. Porter some of the passages I have just read. The only other point to which I wish to call attention is what he writes about his own personal experience in the office. He says:

> As a matter of personal experience in the Census Office, and as substantiating the opinion which is the subject of this communication, I would say that the total amount expended under the administration of Mr. Porter, from April 20, 1889, to the date of his resignation, July 31, 1893, was $9,380,223.80; under Mr. James H. Wardle, acting superintendent, from August 1, 1893, to October 4, 1893, $253,001.52, and under my own administration, from October 5, 1893, to October 5, 1897, $987,488.65. I do not hesitate to say that one-third of the amount expended under my own administration was absolutely wasted, and wasted principally on account of the fact that the office was not under civil-service rules. If this proportion holds good, here is direct substantiation of the opinion I have expressed relative to the saving of $2,000,000 in the census had the force been under civil-service rules.
> You may ask why I express this opinion relative to the amount expended under my own administration. The answer is, that in October, 1893, when I took charge of the Census Office, there was an office force of 1,092. There had been a constant reduction for many months, and this was kept up without cessation till the close of the census. There was never a month after October, 1893, that the clerical force reached the number then in office. Nevertheless, while these general reductions were being made, and in the absence of any necessity for the increase of the force, 339 new appointments were made.

That is, under that old system, while the force was being steadily reduced, new appointments were continually being made in the office when they were not needed, when they replaced experienced clerks and filled the office with beginners at the close of the work. Those figures, Mr. President, seem to me to show conclusively that it will cost a great deal more money to carry on the census under the system proposed by the committee's amendment than by placing it under the civil-service law.

We have on this point the direct testimony of the Superintendent who carried on the last census, and of the head of the Department of Labor, who succeeded him, and in my judgment there is no escape from the figures they give. Therefore the question is, whether we shall deliberately place that great work under this special provision, at an increased expenditure of many hundred thousand dollars of the public money, in order that there shall be a few places here in Washington to which appointments can be made on the personal request of members of the House and of the Senate. That is what it amounts to. It seems to me, in these days when economy in our public expenditures is so much preached, that here is a large economy which might well be made. The people have a right to demand a good census and that no money shall be wasted in multiplying political appointments.

We have just had an example of the other system in regard to the National Library, the Library of Congress, where the offices were carefully excluded from the civil service. I find that for the 108 offices within the gift of the Librarian there were 2,872 applicants. They are given in full in a paper which I shall submit, and I have only to add to it that I inquired of the Librarian as to how much of his time was taken up with the matter of applicants for positions in the Library. He said:

I have given from eight to fourteen hours a day to the library business and very largely to applications for office. Other work, such as writing my report and attending to a large correspondence, was done at my home in the early morning or late in the evening.

In other words, the time of the superintendent of this great Library, which is housed now so appropriately and so well in the noble building on the other side of the square, the time of the man in charge of that important work was given up to listening to applicants for these offices, petty offices for the most part, twenty-eight for every place, and to trying to settle in that scramble who should have the places.

Mr. President, the duty of the superintendent to the people who pay him and put him in there and charge him with this great work was the moving of the books, organizing the Library, drawing his report, and giving his attention to that important department of the Government, and not in deciding what applicants for places in the cloakrooms should be selected, or in listening to the appeals of various members of the House and Senators and others who desired to get places for friends and constituents.

The moment such places are excluded from the civil service the only way my constituent or your constituent can get a position is by our going and trying to get it for them. We are obliged to do it—every one of us—and it is the same with members of the House. I had nearly 150 applications for places in the Library, all of which I was obliged to submit for the consideration of the Superintendent. It seems to me it would have been a saving of the people's money and a great saving of time to their officers if he could have taken persons for those clerical positions from the registers already prepared and open to him. Some of the principal places I know of my own knowledge have been filled by experts—most admirable choices—but I have heard complaint about some of the other small positions that they were not properly filled, and I understand that the Superintendent, almost in desperation, was forced at the last to fill them as rapidly as possible in order to be able to attend to the work with which he is charged. I do not make that statement on his authority. He never said anything about it to me. That is merely what I was told. If there is any truth in the statement, it is due to the system of which the Superintendent was the victim.

Mr. GEAR. I will state, for the benefit of the Senator from Massachusetts, that he took two months to make the selections for the Library.

Mr. GALLINGER. His own time.

Mr. GEAR. He took his own time; fully two months.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that at the end the places were pretty rapidly filled here. I may be mistaken.

Mr. GEAR. When he made up his mind to make them, he made them pretty rapidly.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, I do not think he is to be blamed in the least if satisfactory choices were not made. I think it is a wonder that he has done as well as he has and has succeeded in moving the books and organizing the Library as well as he has, when he has been loaded up with this mass of business which never ought to have been put upon his hands.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Was it not within the power of the officers to take the appointees from the civil service if desired?

Mr. LODGE. I have not the terms of the act here. The provision in the census bill is "not otherwise" than as there prescribed. I do not know what were the terms of the appropriation act. The Senator from Colorado would be more likely to know than I.

Mr. TELLER. I am speaking of the Library.

Mr. LODGE. I understand, but I do not know whether phraseology similar to that of the proposed census act was used in the appropriation act. I can not tell without referring to the statute.

Mr. TELLER. I think not; but if the Librarian could not, the Executive could. It was quite within his power.

Mr. LODGE. I have not the act here, but my impression is that its provision was such that the officers of the Library, the clerks, etc., could not be placed under the civil service; that it was worded in that way.

Mr. GEAR. Except by Executive order. They could have been placed there by Executive order.

Mr. TELLER. I think they could. Undoubtedly, the men who had the appropriation in charge did not intend to prevent the Librarian or the Executive from exercising the power they had under the statute to put the clerks under the civil service if they wanted to.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. In view of the implication which the Senator from Massachusetts has made that a portion of the Library employees are not suited to their work, I think it ought to be stated that the Librarian in making his selections uniformly stated to those who applied for places, as I was obliged to do, that he would select no one as respects the Library who did not come with approved knowledge and expert experience in other libraries. So I do not think that as a rule his employees are unsuited to their work. I am not antagonizing the Senator from Massachusetts at this moment, but I think under the civil service we now and then find an employee who is not exactly suited to the particular work which he is required to do, although he may have passed a very good examination as respects the particular questions propounded to him.

Mr. LODGE. Let me say to the Senator from Iowa——

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Allow me to answer the Senator from Iowa. I have no knowledge of my own that all the employees of the Library are not excellent. I have heard that criticism made by others. So far as I know anything personally about any of the appointments there, which happens to be as to some of the heads of departments, they struck me as being admirable. I merely heard the criticism made by others that in some departments the appointees to the smaller places had not been satisfactory. Of that I have no personal knowledge, but I think the Librarian, under the conditions, has done admirably in getting the Library moved and into the condition it now is. It is very far from my intention to criticise him in any way. On the contrary, I think he has done wonderfully well.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before he passes from the subject, I wish he would be explicit on one point. He has partially answered the question I was about to ask. Has he any reason to believe, from facts within his knowledge, that the Library force as it is now organized, by the Librarian exercising his discretion in the selection of his appointees, is inferior to what it would have been if those appointees had been selected under the civil-service rules?

Mr. LODGE. It is impossible to say what it would have been. I do not know, and no one can know, what might have been.

Mr. CHANDLER. Has the Senator any fact tending to show that it is an inferior force to what it would have been if the Librarian had acted under the civil-service rules?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know what the condition of the force is. The point I made in regard to the Library was that we had put a burden on the Superintendent which interfered with the performance of his proper duties, and which ought not to have been placed on him. He may have the best force in the world; I have not knowledge that he has not. I will come to the question of the force in other places where I have statistics.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not want to interrupt the line of the Senator's argument. I merely want the Senator from Massachusetts to understand——

Mr. GEAR. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that it would have been better, perhaps, in the Library, to resort to the eligible list in order to get the appointees?

Mr. LODGE. I think it would have saved a great deal of time and labor to the Superintendent, at least.

Mr. GEAR. I so understand the Senator. Does the Senator think the appointees would have been better if selected from the eligible list?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the point.

Mr. LODGE. I do think so.

Mr. GEAR. What are his reasons?

Mr. LODGE. I think so simply from analogy with other branches of the service. There is no possibility of comparison with a body never appointed. That would be a mere hypothesis.

Mr. GEAR. Does the Senator think the examination required by the Civil Service Commission is better adapted to secure good employees than appointments at large?

Mr. LODGE. I do, very much; and that is the point I am endeavoring to prove by examples where the service has been in operation long enough to give proof. It is impossible to give proof as to the Library.

Mr. GEAR. Will the Senator pardon me if I give an example of a friend of mine? I desire to impress upon the Senator the character of the questions asked by the Civil Service Commission.

An old soldier in my State made application for a position. He was asked civil-service questions, and then when his average was footed up, it was only 34½. He wrote me, feeling very much aggrieved. I went to the Civil Service Commission. He was examined, bear in mind, for the position of copyist, which simply requires a man to copy what matter is set before him. The first question they asked this old soldier was, What was the cause of the difficulty between the colonies and Great Britain? He was not very well up in history, and he said it was about a dispute in regard to territory. One of the other questions, I recollect very well, was, What citizens of foreign birth distinguished themselves during the Revolutionary war of 1776? He probably forgot Lafayette and Kosciusko and that class of men, and he said "George Washington," and of course they did not mark him high. That man since has taken six examinations, and, having finally been able to pass the examination of the Civil Service Commission, he occupies the position of copyist in the Pension Office.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to add my testimony here in a few words. I may have something to say on this subject later on.

My colleague and I—my colleague will pardon me for suggesting it—made application for a place in the Library, and Librarian Young informed us that he wanted none but the most competent men—men with technical knowledge. New Hampshire has but one place in the Library, filled by a man who has been librarian of the State of New Hampshire, and who, in my judgment, is one of the most efficient librarians in the entire United States. He came here bearing the indorsement of Mr. Dewey and other great librarians of the country. That was the requirement which was made of us in getting one single place for our State in the Library. I think the Senator from Massachusetts ought to know the exact facts in regard to the matter before uttering a general criticism.

Mr. LODGE. I have made no criticism of the Library. I say I have heard criticisms made. So far as my knowledge goes, I do not believe there is foundation for them. I believe, so far as I have knowledge, that it is an excellent force.

All I wanted to say was that if the criticisms were made and there was foundation for them, it was not, in my judgment, the fault of the Librarian. I do not see how any man could possibly make the best selections for the subordinate places under the pressure to which Mr. Young has been subjected; and if he has made mistakes, it would be almost impossible that he could avoid them.

Mr. TELLER rose.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him a moment, I wish to call attention to the language of the statute.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I rose to do. I am glad the Senator from Iowa is about to do it.

Mr. ALLISON. The statute providing for employees for the Library reads as follows:

For the following, selected by the Librarian of Congress by reason of special aptitude for the work of the Library, etc.

So there was enjoined upon the Librarian the duty of selecting people who were specially adapted to library work.

Mr. HOAR. Are these men civil employees, may I inquire of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ALLISON. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee ought to be able, perhaps, to give a better answer than I could possibly give.

Mr. HOAR. No man could give a better answer than the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I take it they are officers and employees of the Government as clerks and employees in the Departments are. They are under the Librarian of Congress, who is at the head of the department.

Mr. HOAR. But the officers in the Departments are appointed by the head of the Department under constitutional authority. Those persons are merely employees, are they not?

Mr. ALLISON. They are employees under the Librarian of Congress, and all the construction that we have given hitherto makes the Library of Congress an independent department. We have had that debated up and down in this body.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. LODGE. Of course.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Since the matter of the status of the clerks in the Library has been suggested, I want to say that I do not understand they are civil officers. I do not understand that the Librarian is the head of a Department. I understand that he is simply an employee or an agent of Congress.

Mr. GEAR. He is appointed by the President.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. He is appointed by the President. That is very true.

Mr. HOAR. He is not the head of a Department.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. He is not the head of a department. The Library is not a Department. It is an institution which has been established by Congress, and all the persons there, in my judgment, employees and all, are simply agents of Congress.

Mr. HOAR. I am sorry to interrupt my colleague, but the point of my question to the Senator from Iowa has been met. One Senator stated that the officers in the Library might be put under the civil-service rules by a mere Executive order. I think that statement was made by the junior Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GEAR. I so stated.

Mr. HOAR. If these persons are civil officers, that is true. If they are civil officers, however, they can only be appointed by the President, by the head of a Department, or in special cases by Congress, or by the Supreme Court. Perhaps there is some clause which has not been brought to my attention, but I did not suppose that the employees in the Library were anything technically but agents, as you would hire a surveyor, as you would hire a draftsman, as you would hire an architect to make a public building. I have not examined to see, and it may be that the Senator from Iowa is right, that they are civil officers under the Constitution, and that the head of the Library is the head of a Department in the constitutional sense and entitled to appoint civil officers. I did not know it.

Mr. ALLISON. If the junior Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to say a word further, I will state that it was purposely to avoid the contention which has arisen that I endeavored not to enter upon the discussion of that question. We had this whole subject up by and large when the Library was reorganized. It was contended here and in the other branch of Congress that the Library of Congress was not a part of the two Houses of Congress, but was a separate and distinct affair; that the Librarian, therefore, must be appointed by the President; and if so, he was of course at the head of a separate and independent department. That was the contention.

Now, the Senator says that would not be true. Thereupon we finally consented in this body that the President should appoint the Librarian of Congress and that the Librarian should select his own employees, believing that he had the right so to do. Then in the law restrictions were placed upon him that he should select all persons because of their special fitness for the duties imposed, and we not only did that in the beginning but we added a proviso.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator read the proviso?

Mr. HOAR. Let me ask a question.

Mr. ALLISON. Wait a moment.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator read the statutory proviso?

Mr. ALLISON. We provided as follows:

That all persons employed in and about said Library of Congress under the Librarian or the superintendent of the Library building and grounds shall be appointed solely with reference to their fitness for their particular duties.

That was the proviso.

Mr. HOAR. I will not say that there are hundreds, but there are numerous public officials appointed by the Presidents who are themselves undoubtedly civil officers, who are not heads of Departments, who employ agencies of their own under acts of Congress, but who can not appoint civil officers, that power being confined by the Constitution to the enumerated powers.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HOAR. One of them was the old Commissioner of Agriculture before he was made a Cabinet officer. Another is the Architect of the Capitol, if I am not mistaken, and the Librarian of Congress before the new arrangement. There are a great many. At any rate, whether in the particular instances that I name they were in all cases appointed by the President or not, the fact will not be questioned that a public office is frequently created by law, the head of which is made a public officer. It has a separate and independent function, but the head of it does not become the head of a Department in the constitutional sense. Now, my question to the Senator from Iowa was whether he claims that among the heads of department is the Librarian of the National Library. I do not understand that he is among them. If he be not, then this office can not be put under the civil-service rules by the President without a change in the statute.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts before he leaves that subject whether there is anything in the Constitution which requires all heads of Departments to be members of the Cabinet? Would not the fact of assigning powers to a person appointed to discharge the duties make him to all intents and purposes the head of a Department for that purpose?

Mr. HOAR. It never has been the practical construction or the understanding in this country, as I understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to enter into a discussion as to the legal effect of the statutes or as to who is or who is not the head of a Department. It is perfectly certain, however, that if the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to appoint a $1,200 clerk in his Department, that clerkship under the general meaning of the statutes is an office.

Mr. HOAR. The clerk takes an oath of office.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator says it is not possible for the President to exercise this power under the law of 1883. I am rather inclined to agree with him; but in the presence of the junior Senator, the special advocate of the civil service, I remember that the Public Printer is a public officer, and has under him a vast number of employees, two or three thousand. Now, the blanket of the civil service has been spread over that entire establishment, although that is not a Department of the Government.

When the statute was passed it was the intention at least of some of those who favored its passage that the Librarian should himself be an expert in library work and that no employees in the Library should be other than those especially fitted to the particular work in hand. Therefore we gave to the Librarian the employment of the few people who were employed. There were not 58 to be employed, because there were carried over, I believe, in all 36 employees who had been in that Library for many years, and whether they had taken a civil-service examination or otherwise, they were supposed to know something about the Library under Mr. Spofford.

That being so, I believe there were only twenty or thirty additional persons to be employed, and we supposed that it would be wiser and better for the Librarian of this great Library to select from all the libraries that were in the country—from Boston, New York, Chicago, and elsewhere, wherever there were great libraries—competent men to go into the Library. I have been told, without knowing the details, that the Librarian has done so. If he has failed to do so, he has failed to execute the statute under which the Library was reorganized.

Mr. LODGE. Now, if I may go back a moment to the argument which I was trying to make before the Constitution intervened, I should like to state again the point that by the testimony of the two heads of the census I think it is proved that it is a cheaper, more economical, and better service to put the routine officers of the census under the civil service.

I alluded to the Library merely to illustrate the point that by forcing the Superintendent to make those appointments we put on him an undue amount of work when his time should be given to something else. I did not mean to bring into the controversy the quality of the force. So far as I know from my personal knowledge it is excellent; and if it is defective it is certainly not owing to any fault of the Superintendent, in my judgment, and it can only be so in some of the minor and routine places.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I understand the Senator to admit that the present force of the Library is just as good as if it had been appointed under civil-service rules?

Mr. LODGE. I do not admit anything of the kind. Nobody can know what the force would have been under civil-service rules, because they were not appointed that way. You can not compare an existing force with a force that never has existed. That is roaming in the region of hypotheses. I dare say it is as good a force as can be got; for aught I know it is.

My only point in alluding to the Library was to show the burdening of the Librarian with duties which I think he should have been spared.

Mr. HALE. Before the Senator goes on, if he will allow me to interrupt him—I do not want to discuss the Library; that is only incidental—but I understood the Senator to say he believes, from his observation and from information which has come to him, that in taking the census the best force could be supplied to that work under the civil-service rules. That is legitimate, and that is the subject under discussion. That is the point of the proposition. I wish to ask the Senator where under the sun he has got that idea?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator was not here when I went into that subject. I have got that idea from the statements of Mr. Porter, the Superintendent of the last census, in the current number of the North American Review, in which he makes that proposition precisely as the one thing that is needed, and from Mr. Carroll D. Wright, the head of the Department of Labor, who proves by figures, beyond a doubt—I am going to print the whole letter in the RECORD—that it involves a much greater cost to carry on the census as it is proposed and as it was carried on the last time. So both he and Mr. Porter testify directly on that point, and that was what I introduced as proof.

Mr. HALE. I am familiar with the utterances of both those gentlemen.

Mr. LODGE. I do not believe the Senator from Maine has read this letter.

Mr. HALE. I had either the good or bad fortune to be chairman of the Committee on the Census which finished the work of 1880 and matured and completed the entire work of 1890. The result of my observation is that the work of the census can be much better done, more cheaply done, brought to an end much more quickly without the interposition of the civil service. That is my experience, and it is my judgment.

Mr. LODGE. The statement of both the Superintendents is the direct contrary, and I know that was also the opinion, as my colleague reminds me, of General Walker. He stated to me, and I have heard him state it over and over again, that it would be an immense saving of time to take the census clerks from the civil-service registers. Mr. Wright gives all the figures here and an analysis of all the expenses. All those three Superintendents agree as to a saving of time and a saving of expense.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Wright had very little to do with the great work of the census. I remember very distinctly that when the work of the census of 1890 began a determined pressure was made by the Civil Service Commission to put that entire work under the charge of the Civil Service Commissioners. They appealed to the President. I was in constant communication with the Superintendent then in charge, Mr. Porter, and neither he nor I believed that the work could be so well done under the Civil Service Commission as outside of it. His entire attitude was in that direction. If he has written any letter since which controverts that position——

Mr. LODGE. The letter is published in the North American Review.

Mr. HALE. Whatever he has said is in entire antagonism with the position he took at that time; and President Harrison, who was not unfavorable to civil service, after considering the matter carefully and deliberately, decided that the work could be better done outside of the civil-service rules.

Mr. GEAR. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I should like to answer that at once.

Mr. GEAR. May I say one word?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. I should like to answer the Senator from Maine.

Mr. GEAR. I just want to state that Mr. Porter made an examination of each and every person who was admitted to that work.

Mr. LODGE. I am aware of that, and it is all set out in his article here. He says:

> The faults of the present system—

He enumerates three, and then he says:

> 4. Placing upon the shoulders of the superintendent, whose mind should be fully occupied with his experts in planning the work, the responsibility of the appointment of an office force of several thousand clerks.

And he goes on to say:

> It will be better, in my opinion, to draw the clerks for the Twelfth Census from the classified service, but chiefly because by so doing it will strengthen the faith of the public in the census. The examinations of the Eleventh Census were much stiffer than those of the civil service for the same grade clerks, yet, because they were left to the discretion of one man, they have been called a "debauch of the public service." And then, again, why transform the Census Office at its busiest season into an examination department for clerks, and the director of a vast scientific investigation into a dispenser of political patronage? It is simply unjust to such an official. Having passed through the ordeal once, I am satisfied that the other way is more practical, and in the end will be better for all concerned.

Then at the end he says:

> In other words, if Congress expects an intelligent census it must not compel its director to chase all over the United States after mortgages on the one hand, and on the other to be chased morning, noon, and night by applicants for office.

There is no doubt what his opinion is now. I have Mr. Carroll D. Wright's paper, in which all the expenses are elaborately given, in which he says that during the four years he had charge, to close up the work, money was wasted. It could not be otherwise, because while the force was in process of reduction there were 339 new appointments made. I do not want to go over that again. It is getting late, and I should like to go on and finish what I have to say.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator yield for just a short question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator designated the former system previous to the adoption of the civil-service system as the patronage system and the civil service as the merit system.

Mr. LODGE. I did so merely for convenience. I do not care what names you call them by.

Mr. STEWART. I have heard that phrase used for convenience so long that I have observed it very carefully, and I am not in favor of it. If I had time I could show that the present system is more emphatically a patronage system than the other. There may be a difference of opinion about that; but when they discharged three or four hundred people from a department for want of something to do, and then filled in again within the next two or three months with a new lot, it looked as if it was a patronage system by the wholesale. Somebody consents to it. My observation for the last ten years, and I have been watching the matter pretty closely, is that the present is more emphatically a patronage system than the other. I do not like the designation.

Mr. LODGE. Now, Mr. President, I return to the point which I am trying to make, that under the present system—I can not say merit system if it jars on the feelings of the Senator from Nevada—but under the existing system there is an absolute improvement in business. There is a service where we can make the exact test. It is the Railway Mail Service. The highest point ever reached by the Railway Mail Service under the old system was one error to 5,575 pieces of mail. That was in 1885. The next year there was the usual general change of clerks under that old system. It went on, and the number of pieces to one mistake sank to 4,228.

The next year it went down to 3,364. Then, as that set of clerks was gradually getting into harness, it began to improve, and it went up again to 3,954. Then came 1890. Half the force was changed, and the number sank again to 1 error in 2,834. Since then the Railway Mail Service has been a permanent force drawn from the civil-service register. There has been a steady rise in the number of pieces correctly handled, until to-day, the year 1897, there is only 1 error in 11,960 pieces of mail.

Mr. HALE. Now, let me ask the Senator a question——

Mr. LODGE. That is from the report of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator suppose that there is a single large business establishment with permanent business in this entire country where the same increased efficiency will not be reported and proved, although it is not under civil service? Of course duration of time, superior faculties, the improvement that comes from long service, apply just as much in any establishment of civil life outside of Government service. It is not the civil-service examination that does it.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator had attended to my figures he would have seen that after each Presidential election the number of errors increased because of the change in the men. You can not take a new man and make him assort letters as well as a trained man, of course. You change your whole service or half your service and get in untrained men. The work of assorting letters in a car is work involving a great deal of dexterity and practice. After each Presidential election, when the men were changed as formerly, the number of errors increased immediately, and when they stop making the political changes in clerks the number of errors is steadily diminished, until to-day it is only 1 in nearly 12,000 pieces of mail.

Now, Mr. President, so much for that. Here I have an extract from the report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1897. Speaking of the force used in the inspection of meat products, he says:

[From the Report of the Secretary of Agriculture, 1897, page 15.]

The force now used in the inspection is competent and efficient, and it should be extended sufficiently to meet the intent of the law looking to the inspection of all the meat entering into interstate and foreign trade. The persons obtained by certification from the eligible list of the civil service, as a rule, have been more competent and efficient than those obtained before the force was brought within the classified service.

The meat-inspection force is now a very competent and efficient one. The inspectors and assistant inspectors are veterinarians, many of whom have passed a rigid examination under the Civil Service Commission, and the greater part of the nonprofessional members of the force have had such long experience that their services are extremely valuable. The persons obtained by certification from the eligible list of the Civil Service Commission have, as a rule, been more competent and efficient than those obtained before the force was brought within the classified service, and it has been possible to maintain much better discipline than was the case when a considerable proportion of the force believed that they had influence which made them more or less independent of the head of the Department and the chief of the Bureau.

Now I come to another point, referring to the economy brought by the reformed system, which I believe is characteristic of good business methods. A certain number of places which were formerly excepted have been put under the civil service by the late extension. On the change of Administration, as those appointments were political, the incumbents were largely dropped, and as they could only be filled from the eligible lists the places were found to be needless. In the immigrant department and in the enforcement of the alien contract laws there has been a saving, by simply giving up unnecessary places, of nearly $80,000 a year. They had an immigrant inspector down here at Alexandria at a pay of $8 a day to inspect immigrants who came there.

Mr. GEAR. Was it not the fault of the appointing power that created those places? Was it not the fault of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. LODGE. No; these were officers not under the civil service at all. I use that office merely as an illustration. There were many like it. The office was held by political appointment. When the civil service came in, the incumbent was dropped. No immigrant inspector was needed in Alexandria. There was no longer any object in keeping him, because nobody was interested in putting a man there from the eligible list.

Mr. GEAR. Permit me to say that perhaps he was not dropped by virtue of the civil service.

Mr. LODGE. The place was wiped out.

Mr. GEAR. But he was dropped simply because the Secretary of the Treasury thought it was better not to have an appointee there, and, of course, in that case he dropped him right away.

Mr. LODGE. He was dropped by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Civil Service Commission had nothing to do with it. But as long as the place could be filled by gift it was kept; when it could not be filled by gift it was not kept.

Mr. GEAR. There is no analogy between that case and cases under the civil service.

Mr. LODGE. There is this analogy: The moment it was put under the civil service it disappeared. As long as it was an excepted place, to be filled on request, it was kept, although it was not needed.

Mr. WILSON. Now may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator is giving us some interesting statistics. Has he any statistics relative to the reason why at Boston, Mass., it costs nearly $300,000 more to collect the customs, with perhaps 100 employees, the collections amounting to $11,000,000, than it does to collect $15,000,000 at Philadelphia, under civil service?

Mr. LODGE. Both custom-houses are under the civil-service system.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, both custom-houses are under the civil-service system.

Mr. LODGE. And have been during the same period. So that has no bearing on the question.

Mr. WILSON. While the Senator is speaking about that, I will say that at Frenchmans Bay, on the coast of Maine, we collect the enormous sum of $420, and have seven employees under civil service. You have thirteen collection districts in the State of Maine, similarly located with the State of Washington, while we have but one collection district in the State of Washington, where we are known as spoilsmen.

Mr. LODGE. That has absolutely nothing to do with the question, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. WILSON. It is in the line of the Senator's argument.

Mr. LODGE. That merely goes to prove what I have long known, that the customs districts of this country ought to be revised. There are too many separate districts in my State, I think; in all the older States there are too many. But the civil-service system has nothing to do with the establishment of customs districts. It can not establish an office.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the Senator understands perfectly about the Massachusetts districts, as I do about those in Maine. The sole use for a customs force is not to collect revenue, but to prevent infractions of the revenue. The line of custom-houses running from New Jersey to the British provinces, aside from Boston and New York, do not collect much revenue.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that.

Mr. HALE. But they prevent smuggling and infractions of the revenue, and send all the importations into the great ports. So the Senator from Washington ought to, if he does not, understand that the uses and benefits of a custom-house do not depend at all upon the amount of revenue it collects.

Mr. HOAR. With the permission of my colleague, I desire to ask the Senator from Washington a question. What is the population of the most populous town on the seaboard in the district of which he speaks?

Mr. WILSON. In your State?

Mr. HOAR. No, in the Senator's State.

Mr. WILSON. Does the Senator mean the population on the seaboard of Puget Sound?

Mr. HOAR. I do not ask the population on the seaboard; I ask what is the most populous town on the seaboard.

Mr. WILSON. On the seaboard of the Pacific Coast?

Mr. HOAR. No. The Senator said in his State it took a very much less sum to collect a certain amount of revenue than it did on the Massachusetts and Maine coasts. I asked him if he would state the population of the most populous town on the seaboard in his State.

Mr. WILSON. Seattle, which has a population of about 70,000.

Mr. HOAR. On the eastern line of coast which the Senator mentions we have a dozen harbors and a dozen towns with a population nearly equal to that.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes; and I will say to the Senator, if I may interrupt the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] just a moment——

Mr. LODGE. The Senator does not interrupt me more than other Senators.

Mr. WILSON. I appeal to the good nature of the Senator from Massachusetts. I did not intend to bring up this matter. But the fact is true that while we have a State similarly located to the State of Maine, on the border, where we are classed somewhat as spoilsmen and against the civil service, we have only 57 employees in a district which collects more revenue than all the 13 districts in Maine, where they have 130 employees. At Frenchmans Bay and at Saco you collect no revenue. Why do you require so many employees where you collect no revenue? One man would be sufficient.

Mr. HALE. No, he would not, because on that coast, which is open on every bay and every inlet to what is called smuggling, you have got to keep a force that will prevent fraudulent importation.

Mr. WILSON. Under the same conditions as exist in Maine and Massachusetts we have but 57 employees.

Mr. HALE. You do not have such conditions on the Pacific coast.

Mr. WILSON. On the border we are situated exactly similarly.

Mr. HALE. The importations do not come to you as they come to us.

Mr. WILSON. They are greater with us than in your State.

Mr. HALE. If you abolish the force of the custom-houses along the bays of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Maine, if you strike it out on the score of economy, certainly one-quarter of the importations that come into Boston would come into these small places.

Mr. LODGE. I did not intend to wander off over a discussion of the customs districts when I spoke of the Boston customs district. I simply stated that I thought some of them might be consolidated with advantage and the work done by deputies in a great many places where now you have collectors. Of course, along the coast you must have deputies at all points where imports can be made.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have the Senator permit me to make a point in connection with his suggestions.

Mr. LODGE. If it will not interrupt me.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is in connection with the legitimate argument from which the Senator has been diverted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON]. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to be reciting the discharges of immigration inspectors under the present Administration as a proof of the efficacy of the civil-service system, did I not?

Mr. LODGE. I was going to expand that, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will let the Senator expand it after I have made a suggestion to him. If the Senator will allow me to say so, I do not see that the economies which are being practiced by the present Secretary of the Treasury in discharging Democrats whom he does not deem necessary has anything whatever to do with the merits or demerits of the civil-service system. There is no reason why every head of a Department should not discharge Democrats who are not needed for carrying on the Government under a Republican Administration; but it requires very great ingenuity on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts to make the performance of that duty an argument for filling the offices by civil-service examination.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the point is a very simple one, if I may answer the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. WILSON. One moment. I want to appeal to the Senator, if he will permit me. Has he been any more diverted by my argument than the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]? [Laughter.]

Mr. LODGE. They have both been diverting arguments.

I quote further from the report of the supervising special agent in regard to the customs and immigrant inspection. He says:

> During the past six months the cost of maintaining this division has been reduced $55,102.50 per annum without detriment to the efficiency of the force, the services of 19 special inspectors of customs and 10 Chinese inspectors having been discontinued.

The Senator from New Hampshire asked how I connect that with the civil-service system. Very simply. These offices were excepted places; men were appointed to them without examination. They were not abolished, although they were unnecessary, because some desirable person was provided for in them. When this Administration came in there was no political reason for keeping the incumbents, and therefore they were dismissed. Nobody was then interested in filling the places, because they had passed into the great mass of the classified civil service. Then the absolute needlessness of the office came into play, and it was abolished. These were the first special inspectors, appointed for a temporary purpose, and kept on in that way. I will print all the figures at the end of my remarks.

I only desire to say now, in conclusion, that the points I have brought forward have been with a view of showing that you get a greater efficiency under the civil-service system, and that you get a great relief to the heads of Departments who are charged with the work.

I am quite familiar with the argument that business houses do not select their clerks and employees by competitive examinations. That is undoubtedly true. It is equally true that they do not select them on the recommendations of Senators and Representatives, however excellent those recommendations may be; neither do they discharge them on a change of Administration. We can not run the public business as private business, because it is public business and not private business. You will have to apply other methods to it, and competitive examination takes the offices out of politics and brings the conduct of Government business as nearly as possible to that of successful private business.

My whole contention is that the method now in vogue, the present system of the civil service, is a great deal better than the old system. That there are defects in it, that there have been wrong classifications, I am perfectly aware from the investigations made by the Committee on Civil Service, of which I am a member. Those errors can all be cured by an Executive order. There is no need to legislate on them. They should be left to the President to deal with.

I believe also, in regard to the census, that the best opinion of the experts, with all the figures and detailed examination of expenses, which I shall print with my remarks and to which I invite attention, point to the fact that it is in the interest of the public service to take the most of the routine offices out of the hands of the director, or rather not take them out of his hands, but let him select his subordinates from the eligible list and save himself from the political pressure and the labor imposed by dispensing political patronage.

Mr. President, I have here a speech which was made in the House of Representatives on the 24th of April, 1890. It puts the argument, as it occurs to my mind, better than I can put it. I think, indeed, that it puts the whole argument on the general question. Mr. McKinley said:

> Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Chairman, in the single moment that I have I desire to say that I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] to strike from this bill the appropriation for the execution of the civil-service law. My only regret is that the Committee on Appropriations did not give to the commission all the appropriation that was asked for for the improvement and extension of the system. If the Republican party of this country is pledged to any one thing more than another it is to the maintenance of the civil-service law and its efficient execution; not only that, but to its enlargement and its further application to the public service.
> The law that stands upon our statute books to-day was put there by Republican votes. It was a Republican measure. Every national platform of the Republican party since its enactment has declared not only in favor of its continuance in full vigor, but in favor of its enlargement so as to apply more generally to the public service. And this, Mr. Chairman, is not alone the declaration and purpose of the Republican party, but it is in accordance with its highest and best sentiment—aye, more, it is sustained by the best sentiment of the whole country, Republican and Democratic alike. And there is not a man on this floor who does not know that no party in this country, Democratic or Republican, will have the courage to wipe it from the statute book or amend it save in the direction of its improvement.
> Look at our situation to-day. When this party of ours has control of all the branches of the Government, it is proposed to annul this law by withholding appropriations for its execution, when for four years under a Democratic Administration nobody on this side of the House had the temerity to rise in his place and make a motion similar to the one now pending for the nullification of this law. We thought it was good then, good enough for a Democratic Administration; and I say to my Republican associates it is good enough for a Republican Administration; it is good and wholesome for the whole country. If the law is not administered in letter and spirit impartially, the President can and will supply the remedy. Mr. Chairman, the Republican party must take no backward step. The merit system is here, and it is here to stay, and we may just as well understand and accept it now and give our attention to correcting the abuses, if any exist, and improving the law wherever it can be done to the advantage of the public service.

Since then the maker of the speech I have just read has come to be President of the United States, and he holds firmly and consistently, as appears from his message and his acts, the same position as President that he held when he was a member of the House of Representatives. It seems to me that in his remarks in 1890 are well summed up all the arguments for the law as a whole, and I think if we apply it in this particular to the census we shall give the people of the country a better census, that we shall be enabled to relieve the superintendent of a great deal of unnecessary work, and, as Mr. Porter says, the people will put more faith in the census when it is made.

APPENDIX A.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1897.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your note inquiring whether I had made the statement that the work of taking the last census cost $2,000,000 more than it would have cost if the appointments in the Census Office had been made under the civil-service rules, and, if I had made such statement, on what data I had based it, I have to say that the statement was made by me in an official report on a plan for a permanent census service, made in accordance with "joint resolution relating to the Federal census" approved March 19, 1896. The report was submitted December 7, 1896, and is known as Senate Document No. 5, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session. The statement alluded to is on page 9 of this report, and is as follows:

"The absolute necessity of bringing the whole census force into the classified service, in accordance with the act of January 16, 1883, and the amendments thereto and rules thereunder, seems to me perfectly apparent. Had this been the rule in the Eleventh Census, there would have been, in my opinion, a saving of at least $2,000,000 and more than a year's time."

I should have very much preferred that the statement made relative to the saving of at least $2,000,000 could have rested as a matter of opinion, but as you have called for the data on which I base this opinion, I shall furnish them. In doing this I am obliged to make comparison between the work of the Department of Labor and that of the Eleventh Census Office, and thus place myself in an attitude which may subject me to some captious criticism. The comparison I make is one between systems, and not between administrations under the two systems; for in the case in hand, while at the head of the Department of Labor, I was for four years in charge of the Federal Census Office. Thus, whatever comparison is made involves, in some degree, my own administration of the Census Office as well as that of the Department of Labor.

The work of this Department "and that of the Census Office is of the same general grade. The facts on which reports are based are gathered by enumerators or special agents in both cases, correspondence, as a rule, being used simply for purposes of explanation or verification, when needed."

The quality of the work performed by the Census Office and by this Department need not be brought into comparison beyond this, that all the investigations conducted by the Department of Labor are quite as difficult as the most difficult investigations conducted by the Census Office; but the cost of securing results may be compared. The facts exist for a fairly just comparison of the cost of production under two systems, the Department of Labor operating under civil-service rules and the Census Office being exempt therefrom.

The cost of production can be ascertained by learning the time and money cost of specified units of production. The efficiency of labor in production can be determined by the same method. To ascertain the cost, and thus the efficiency, of production under the two systems like elements must be brought into comparison. A statement of the cost of production under the two systems will enable you to determine whether the opinion I expressed in the official report on a permanent census office is fairly well substantiated. To this end I submit the following table, which covers the productive period of the Census Office and embraces the total production of that office and of the Department of Labor for the same period.

I have not included in the following tabular statement the bulletins nor the compendium published by the Census Office, nor the bimonthly bulletin and a large amount of material prepared by the Department of Labor for a report on the wages of the commercial countries of the world. The bulletins and the compendium of the Census Office are transcripts to a large extent, the material being drawn from the tabulations made for the final reports. The comparative table is as follows:

Comparative statement of the work and its cost in the Census Bureau and in the Department of Labor from April 1, 1889, to June 30, 1897.

Items.	United States Department of Labor.	Eleventh Census of the United States.
Nonpareil ems of matter per page	4,602	9,744
Number of pages of matter prepared	17,285	21,428
Number of 1,000 ems of matter prepared	79,546	208,794
Total disbursements, exclusive of printing, engraving, and binding	$1,369,777.26	$10,016,677.68
Cost per 1,000 nonpareil ems of matter, exclusive of printing, engraving, and binding	17.22	47.97
Total disbursements, exclusive of the salaries and expenses of the field force and of printing, engraving, and binding	875,982.44	5,670,847.15
Cost per 1,000 nonpareil ems of matter, exclusive of the salaries and expenses of the field force and of printing, engraving, and binding	11.01	27.16

There are two basic comparisons in the foregoing table. The first relates to the total cost in the two offices per 1,000 nonpareil ems of matter, the cost of printing, engraving, and binding being excluded. Under this comparison the cost of production in the Census Office was 178.57 per cent greater than in the Department of Labor. The objection may be raised that this comparison includes the great cost of the force of enumerators and special agents employed in the census; so another comparison, the second one in the table, has been made, showing the cost per 1,000 nonpareil ems of matter, exclusive of the total cost of collecting the material, in both offices, and of the cost of printing, engraving, and binding the results; in other words, this comparison is based purely on the cost of compiling the material after it was collected. By this comparison it is seen that the cost per 1,000 nonpareil ems of matter was 146.68 per cent greater in the Census Office than in the Department of Labor.

Bringing this comparison to a concrete and quantitative statement, it is seen that had the cost of preparing the matter by the Eleventh Census Office been at the same rate per 1,000 nonpareil ems as was the cost of preparing like matter in the Department of Labor, the total cost under the first comparison—that is, exclusive of printing, engraving, and binding—would have been $3,595,432.68 instead of $10,016,677.68, a saving of $6,421,245, while under the second comparison, that excluding the cost of the field force in collecting the material as well as that of printing, engraving, and binding, it would have been $2,298,821.94 instead of $5,670,847.15, a saving of $3,372,025.21.

The above statements more than justify the opinion which I expressed in the report on a plan for a permanent census service, for instead of an extra cost of $2,000,000, to which I guardedly limited myself, it is apparent that under the first comparison there was an extra cost of $6,421,245, and, under the second comparison, of $3,372,025. The magnitude of the census work, the lack of time for preparation, the temporary nature of the force, etc., may properly, and perhaps sufficiently, account for the extraordinary expense above the $2,000,000, which I have attributed to the absence of civil-service rules.

The figures which I have given thoroughly justify the opinion Mr. Porter expressed to me several years ago, that it would have been much better had the Eleventh Census been taken in accordance with civil-service rules, an opinion he has now given to the public in an interesting article in the North American Review for the current month, in which he gives as one of the faults of the system under which censuses have been taken "the placing upon the shoulders of the Superintendent, whose mind should be fully occupied with his experts in planning the work, the responsibility of the appointment of an office force of several thousand clerks."

Mr. Porter graphically sums up his views relative to the civil service in these words:

> If Congress expects an intelligent census it must not compel its director to chase all over the United States for mortgages, on the one hand, and, on the other, to be chased morning, noon, and night by applicants for office.

If it be necessary to further substantiate the opinion about which you have done me the honor to make inquiry, I would submit the following statement relative to the work and its cost in the Tenth and Eleventh censuses, respectively:

Comparative statement of the work and its cost in the Tenth and Eleventh Censuses of the United States.

Items.	Tenth Census of the United States.	Eleventh Census of the United States.
Nonpareil ems of matter per page	9,744	9,744
Number of pages of matter prepared	19,298	21,428
Number of 1,000 ems of matter prepared	188,040	208,794
Total cost	$5,862,750.24	$11,545,713.97
Cost per 1,000 nonpareil ems of matter	$31.18	$55.30

Unfortunately, with the data at hand I am unable to make a comparison between the cost of production of results in the Tenth and Eleventh Censuses, excluding the cost of collection of material and of printing, engraving, and binding. The foregoing table is based entirely upon the total cost, and by this table it is seen that in 1880 the cost per 1,000 nonpareil ems of matter was $31.18, and in 1890, $55.30, being an increase in cost of 77.36 per cent per 1,000 ems. Had the cost of production of results at the Eleventh Census been the same as at the Tenth, the total cost of the Eleventh would have been $6,510,196.90, instead of $11,545,713.97, a difference of $5,035,517.05.

Relative to this comparison, the point may be raised that the Census Office was not under civil-service rules in 1880 any more than in 1890. This is true; but in 1880 no office of the Government was under civil-service rules, and there was, therefore, a diffusion or distribution of attempts to secure positions, while at the Eleventh Census the Bureau was probably the only one in the Executive Departments in Washington not under civil service, so that the concentration of applications was upon the Census Office.

As a matter of personal experience in the Census Office, and as substantiating the opinion which is the subject of this communication, I would say that the total amount expended under the administration of Mr. Porter, from April 20, 1889, to the date of his resignation, July 31, 1893, was $9,380,223.80; under Mr. James H. Wardle, acting superintendent, from August 1, 1893, to October 4, 1893, $253.001.52, and under my own administration, from October 5, 1893, to October 5, 1897, $987,488.65. I do not hesitate to say that one-third of the amount expended under my own administration was absolutely wasted, and wasted principally on account of the fact that the office was not under civil-service rules.

If this proportion holds good, here is direct substantiation of the opinion I have expressed relative to the saving of $2,000,000 in the census had the force been under civil-service rules.

You may ask why I express this opinion relative to the amount expended under my own administration. The answer is that in October, 1893, when I took charge of the Census Office, there was an office force of 1,092. There had been a constant reduction for many months, and this was kept up without cessation till the close of the census. There was never a month after October, 1893, that the clerical force reached the number then in office; nevertheless, while these general reductions were being made, and in the absence of any necessity for the increase of the force, 339 new appointments were made.

One other reason, to answer your question, is found in the fact of the very large number of individual appointments during the existence of the Census Office. The largest number on duty as an office force at any one time was in April, 1891, when there were 3,119 employees carried on the census pay roll. Ordinarily it would seem that as before and after this date this number was never exceeded, the total number of appointments in the Census Office, barring a few emergencies, would not have exceeded 3,119; as a matter of fact, the total number of individuals, not including special agents, upon the rolls of the office force during the existence of the Bureau was 4,465, nearly 50 per cent more than the highest number employed at any one time. This statement indicates the constantly shifting nature of the personnel of the Census Office, a condition which would not have existed had the force been under civil-service rules.

Trusting I have fully answered your kind inquiry,

I am, very respectfully,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate.

APPENDIX B.

THE CENSUS OF 1900.

[By the Hon. Robert P. Porter, Superintendent of the Eleventh Census, in North American Review, December, 1897.]

One of the first acts of Congress on convening in December should be the passage of a preliminary law for the purpose of putting in motion the machinery for taking the Twelfth Census. The work of preparation for a census such as that of the United States is as vast and important as the actual enumeration itself. The demand for exact statistics is constantly increasing, and the importance of greater accuracy and care in securing statistical data of all kinds would seem to indicate that as soon as the volumes of one census are published the preparatory work of another should commence. Under the present system it is impossible to keep the avenues of information open, and the skilled statisticians, experts, and trained clerks become scattered. Unless Congress acts immediately there is great danger of repeating mistakes and attempting costly experiments.

Those who have examined into the subject know that, whatever the mistakes of the Tenth and Eleventh censuses, they were the result of imperfect laws, and not the result of inefficient management. Those who for partisan or even more unworthy motives criticise the results of either of the last two enumerations of the population of the United States seem to forget that the best available statistical talent in the country was employed. Of the 30 statistical experts in charge of the several branches of inquiry on the Eleventh Census, 25 were capable experts who performed similar work for the Tenth Census.

Of the five or six new men brought into prominence by the Eleventh Census, one is to-day the Statistician of the Agricultural Department, another is his first assistant, a third occupies one of the highest places in the Labor Department, a fourth is chief of an important division of the Geological Survey, and a fifth was called to occupy a place of great statistical responsibility in the Treasury Department. Every one of these experts, appointed by the alleged partisan management of the Eleventh Census, stepped from the Census Office into the several Departments referred to during the last Democratic Administration.

Of the other men in charge of the several divisions of both Tenth and Eleventh censuses may be mentioned Dr. John S. Billings, now in charge of the public library of New York, and known throughout the world as the best authority in the United States on all matters appertaining to vital statistics; Henry Gannett, not less distinguished in geographical research and geographer of the United States Geological Survey; Dr. Fred H. Wines, secretary of the State board of charities of Illinois, the recognized authority of the country on all questions relating to the dependent, defective, and delinquent classes; Dr. David T. Day, the well-known mining expert of the Geological Survey; S. N. D. North, of Boston, secretary of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, a statistical expert of wide experience and recognized ability; Prof. Henry C. Adams, statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and a dozen other men whose names are not so well known publicly, but who in statistical circles have reputations for as thorough and as honest statistical work as any critic of either the Tenth or Eleventh Census.

When, therefore, ungenerous critics are clamoring for an "honest census" for 1900, and an "accurate census" for the "last decade of the century," and thereby insinuating that the work heretofore was neither honest nor accurate, they overlook the fact that the Superintendent or director of the Twelfth Census, if he performs his duty, must organize his office on precisely the same lines as his two immediate predecessors did, if he hopes to attain an equal degree of success.

There was absolutely no partisanship in the narrow spirit about the Eleventh Census. It was organized from beginning to end, as such a great work should be organized, on the broadest possible plan, and the best known statisticians and experts were invited to take part in the work, irrespective of their political or economic faith. The Eleventh Census, however, needs no defense, for the 25 volumes speak for themselves, and they have been separately and collectively indorsed by those best qualified to pass judgment on such work.

The methods of tabulation which were inaugurated in 1890 have been subsequently adopted by nearly all the principal European countries, and M. Troinitski, the eminent statistician of Russia, is using precisely the same system in the tabulation of the Imperial census of that country. Indeed, the machines for the Russian census were made in the United States, and some of the identical devices used in the Eleventh Census are at this moment doing duty in St. Petersburg.

The defects of the Eleventh Census—and no one realizes them more keenly than the writer—did not arise from the direction of, nor could they have been remedied by, the capable corps of experts. They were, in fact, the result of delayed legislation, hasty preparation, and an overburdening of the office with inquiries irrelevant and unnecessary. In his testimony before the House Committee on Census, when the question of a permanent Census Office was under consideration, Mr. Carroll D. Wright, in referring to the Eleventh Census, said:

"I believe the present census to be as good a one as anyone could take under the present system. I know Mr. Porter has done as well as anyone could have done under the faulty system."

The faults of the present system may be thus enumerated:

1. Inadequate time for preparation.

2. A hard and fast law, rushed through the day before the adjournment of Congress, calling for innumerable statistical investigations and inquiries, many of which are useless and impracticable, and some of which are impossible.

3. Supplemental questions for the 20,000,000 or more schedules called for by Congress ninety days prior to the actual enumeration.

4. Placing upon the shoulders of the Superintendent, whose mind should be fully occupied with his experts in planning the work, the responsibility of the appointment of an office force of several thousand clerks.

If Congress in its wisdom will remedy these defects there will be no trouble with the Twelfth Census, beyond those complaints which arise from too great local expectations in the way of population, and here and there defective enumerations necessarily incident to the employment of an army of 60,000 persons. How can these defects best be remedied? First, by making the census a permanent office of the Government, and applying to it precisely the same rules and regulations as to the employment of clerical help as are in vogue in other Departments.

If this were done, special civil-service examinations might be held for the work prior to the time the clerks would be needed, and the Census Office would then have a sufficiently large eligible list to draw from. In 1890 I accepted civil-service examinations of the higher grades, but that did not do away with the necessity of examining 2,700 clerks in the office, and this, with the work of appointment, literally took up all the time of the Superintendent, whose mind should have been free for his purely statistical duties.

The examinations of the Eleventh Census were fair and just, and conducted by a man whose partisanship was of so inoffensive a nature that he was retained through the Cleveland Administration, while the appointment clerk of the Census Office—a Democrat, by the way—was promoted by the same Administration, and still occupies a responsible Government office. The clerical force thus gathered together proved most efficient and the work accomplished greater in quantity and superior in quality than that of any other bureau of the Government.

It should be remembered that hundreds of these people were engaged in addressing envelopes, numbering cards by machinery, punching cards, working electrical machines, and in work that practically had to be learned after the clerk came into the office. As a matter of fact, some of the most expert of these men and women, "record breakers," as they were called, were those appointed as laborers, who were unable to pass the examination, but whose manual dexterity made up for inability to fill out technical examination blanks.

There was a great deal more money lost to the Government in consequence of insufficient time for planning the work and the inability to secure expert and well-trained division chiefs than in consequence of the lack of ability of the clerical force. It will be better, in my opinion, to draw the clerks for the Twelfth Census from the classified service, but chiefly because by so doing it will strengthen the faith of the public in the census. The examinations of the Eleventh Census were much stiffer than those of the civil service for the same grade clerks; yet, because they were left to the discretion of one man, they have been called a "debauch of the public service."

And then, again, why transform the Census Office at its busiest season into an examination department for clerks and the director of a vast scientific investigation into a dispenser of political patronage? It is simply unjust to such an official. Having passed through the ordeal once, I am satisfied that the other way is more practical and in the end will be better for all concerned.

It is not necessary to dwell on the advantages of a permanent Census Office; for the subject has been thoroughly investigated by both committees of Congress. In 1893 the House Committee on Census, after having the matter laid before them by the Superintendent of the Eleventh Census, and hearing the testimony of many experts, including the late Gen. Francis A. Walker, reported in favor of a permanent bureau, and submitted a bill for that purpose.

It was shown in this inquiry that in all branches of census work, but especially in preparing for the important work of enumeration, great injury necessarily results, both as regards accuracy and economy, from the hurried and hastily considered methods incident to a system where sufficient time for careful and deliberate work is not given. A permanent census bureau would result in great economy as well as better work.

At least $2,000,000 can be saved by abolishing certain inquiries, such as those relating to mortgages, indebtedness, and those which can be more satisfactorily conducted by other Departments of the Government. Note the following:

ESTIMATED COST OF ELEVENTH CENSUS.

Farms, homes, and mortgages	$1,500,000
Veterans of the war	100,000
Fish and fisheries	150,000
Transportation	150,000
Insurance	75,000
Indians (condition of)	75,000
Total	2,050,000

The first two of these inquiries will not be called for again. The Fish Commission is abundantly able to take care of the statistics of that industry. The Interstate Commerce Commission gives all the statistical information the Government requires on steam railways. The several States of the Union prepare annually elaborate reports in relation to insurance, and, aside from the bare enumeration, there is no necessity for the Census Office to make elaborate reports on the conditions of the Indians.

Yet the act of March 3, 1889, made all these inquiries mandatory upon the Superintendent of Census. For this reason, I believe the Superintendent should be appointed first by a preliminary act, and that he, in conjunction with certain experts, should frame a simple, practical bill and submit it, with accompanying report setting forth in full the reason for its adoption, to Congress. The measure which then became a law would be carried into effect by its originators, and not by a superintendent suddenly called upon to administer an act loaded with impracticable schemes for statistical inquiry, many entirely foreign to the census.

In conclusion, let us hope not only that the special inquiries will be limited in the Twelfth Census, but the schedules simplified, and such investigations, outside of population statistics, as may be necessary taken out of the hands of the enumerators and given to the special agent. The census of 1900 should be, first of all, a scientific and accurate count of the people of the United States. To accomplish this it is absolutely necessary to discard such inquiries as I have indicated above and, as far as practicable, relegate the "special investigations" or inquiries that do not require a house-to-house canvass to special agents.

The schedules must be brief and simple and not be burdened as heretofore, by act of Congress, with inquiries relating to the individual indebtedness, chronic diseases, and other inquisitorial questions. In other words, if Congress expects an intelligent census, it must not compel its director to chase all over the United States after mortgages on the one hand, and on the other to be chased morning, noon, and night by applicants for office.

Remove these obstacles to efficient work, give the Bureau time enough to perfect its plans, and opportunity to secure division chiefs capable of training the office force, and the census of 1900 will be all that can be reasonably hoped for by the most exacting statistician.

APPENDIX E.

[Report of Postmaster-General, 1896.]

The Railway Mail Service has been steadily advanced by the addition of post-office cars, an increase of clerks, and a marked improvement in the speed and accuracy of working the mails. The separation of not only all first-class matter, but of almost all the newspaper mail before reaching the cities, makes possible an immediate delivery by carriers after the arrival of trains.

On the 30th of June, 1896, mails were carried on 172,794 miles of railroad, and 6,779 postal clerks were employed on 152,825 miles, including steam, electric, and cable cars.

The number of pieces of ordinary mail matter distributed by the Railway Mail Service during the year was 11,166,323,240, an increase over the previous year of 788,448,200, while there was a decrease in the number of errors made of 32,270. But 1 error was made for each 9,843 pieces distributed, as against 1 in every 2,834 in the fiscal year 1890 and 1 in every 8,894 last year.

"In this connection I beg leave to call attention to the following table, giving the number of pieces distributed, the number of errors in distribution, and the number "correct to each error" for each year from 1884 to 1896, inclusive, not only to show the steady improvement in the service, but to show how constant and marked that improvement has been since the clerks were put under civil-service rules. It will be recalled that wholesale discharges of postal clerks were made on political grounds near the close of the fiscal year 1889, the effect of which appears in an increase of nearly 1,000,000 errors in 1890 and the large falling off in the number "correct to each error." In no branch of the postal service has civil-service reform shown such good results as in the Railway Mail Service.

[Report of Civil Service Commission, 1896.]

The General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, in his last annual report, says:

"In several preceding annual reports I have expressed appreciation of the substantial benefits of the civil-service methods of selecting new appointees for the Railway Mail Service by competitive examination."

In this report it is shown that while the number of pieces of mail matter distributed per clerk has increased from 1,222,762 in 1885 to 1,779,759 in 1896, the ratio of errors to the number of pieces distributed correctly has decreased from 1 error to each 5,575 pieces distributed correctly in 1885 to 1 error for each 9,843 pieces distributed correctly in 1896. He adds:

"I have purposely selected the year 1885, because it shows the highest per cent distributed correctly to each error previous to the placing of the Railway Mail Service under the jurisdiction of the civil-service laws and regulations."

The table published on page 5 of the report of the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service is a conclusive argument of the evils of the old system.

As shown in the report, the highest efficiency ever attained under that system, after years of practice, was 1 error in every 5,575 correct deliveries. There was a change in the Administration, and the errors increased to 1 error in every 3,364 correct deliveries, but before the close of that Administration the service had gradually improved until 3,954 correct distributions were made to each error.

Then came another change of Administration, followed by the usual removals, and the efficiency immediately fell to 1 error in every 2,834 pieces correctly distributed. Since the classification of the service, however, the elimination of political removals (and appointments based purely upon ascertained fitness) has been followed by continuously increasing yearly efficiency, until now the maximum efficiency has been reached, as shown by the record above quoted, of nearly 10,000 correct distributions for each error.

Like evidence could be given from the reports of the various officers of the Government and from the statements of the heads of bureaus and divisions who have been longest in the service and who have best knowledge of the workings of the Executive Departments.

APPENDIX E.

[Page 4, Report of General Superintendent Railway Mail Service, 1897.]

MAIL DISTRIBUTED.

There were 6,059,769,680 pieces of first-class mail matter handled during the year just closed, and 5,511,771,000 pieces of second, third, and fourth class matter, making a total of 11,571,540,680 pieces, exclusive of registered matter. Of the latter class of matter there were handled 14,640,832 packages and cases, 984,093 through registered pouches, and 631,738 inner registered sacks, making in all 16,256,663 pieces of registered matter.

There were also handled 462,469,640 pieces of city mail. The increase of ordinary mail handled over last year was 405,217,440 pieces, or 3.7 per cent; a decrease of 329,943, or 2.2 per cent, in the number of single pieces of registered matter, and an increase of 150,436, or 10.2 per cent, in the number of through registered pouches and inner registered sacks handled, which explains the decrease in the number of single packages handled. The amount of city mail handled exceeded that of last year by 54,402,440, or 13.3 per cent.

The following table will show the number of clerks assigned to lines, the amount of mail handled, the number of errors in distribution, with the per cent of increase or decrease, for a period of ten years:

Year ended June 30—	Number of clerks.a	Per cent of increase in clerks.	Pieces of mail matter distributed.	Per cent of increase.	Errors in distribution.	Per cent.		Pieces correct to each error.	Per cent.

a Acting clerks not included in this table.

From this it will be seen that while the amount of mail handled has increased 77.2 per cent in ten years the working force required to do the work has increased but 48.6 per cent, and the pieces of mail matter handled correctly to each error in distribution has increased from 3,694 to 11,960.

The above table also shows that there were 967,538 errors in distribution charged against postal clerks during the year, as against 1,134,412 for last year, a decrease of 14.7 per cent. There were 722,276 errors in distribution checked against post-offices, a decrease, as compared with last year, of 80,295, or a little over 10 per cent.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it seems appropriate at this time to briefly indicate what the pending measure proposes. This Senate bill No. 94, to which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has just addressed his remarks, does not in and of itself provide for the taking of the Twelfth Census. It merely provides the skeleton of a preliminary organization, the chief purpose of which, we hope, will have been subserved before the 1st day of February, if this bill shall pass with the promptness that we hope it will.

The total number of employees, including the director, to be engaged under and in conformity with the provisions of this bill will not exceed 32 in number. The first will be the director of the census, to be appointed, according to the terms of the bill, by the President. It will not be contended, I believe, with any seriousness, that it would be well to attempt a civil-service examination to select the executive officer to be charged with this important work.

Second, the assistant director. The person selected for this second place should certainly be agreeable to the director, and would more properly be chosen by the exercise of the judgment of the Chief Executive of the country than could possibly obtain by or through any sort of civil-service examination.

The director, as is aptly suggested to me by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], and the assistant director are to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Third. We are to have five thoroughly competent statisticians, who are to operate under the direction of this Bureau. I assume as a fact that the Senator from Massachusetts would not, if he could, compel the director, who is to be held responsible before the country for the prompt and satisfactory execution of this census work, to select these five principal statisticians on the certification of the Civil Service Board.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not. I did not contend that. Of course the heads of departments, the men to whom great subjects are intrusted, must be selected as they were before, when experts were selected in every case without reference to politics or to recommendations.

Mr. CARTER. Then the Senator so far would not, as to this particular measure, have any objection to the existing provision?

Mr. LODGE. What I was after, if the Senator will allow me, was the 2,700 clerks which have been alluded to.

Mr. CARTER. But what I desire to make clear to the Senate at this time is that the remarks addressed by the Senator from Massachusetts apply to a bill not now before the Senate—a bill contemplated, it is true, by this preliminary measure, but to be adopted in its proper time and on its own merits. There are some few assistants to be employed by the director of the census in this preliminary work under the provisions of this bill, thirty-two in number.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I referred to. Those thirty-two will not, of course, come within the scope of my remarks. But this refers to clerks of classes 4, 3, 2, and 1.

Mr. CARTER. Then we have in this bill, which will have served its purpose within sixty days, save as to the director and the chief statistician, refused to consider anything but the question whether the director appointed by the President to prepare a plan for the next census shall first halt in his work to select, through the civil-service scheme, a few people who may be essential to the performance of this act.

The terms of these employees thus to be selected, thirty-two being the maximum named, will have expired within sixty days from the time of their designation. This bill does not provide for their employment permanently in connection with the census, but only to serve for the purposes of the bill now under consideration. For instance, a selection is made through the civil-service system. From the distant State of California comes forth a man who is certified as one of the thirty-two to perform sixty days' service in the city of Washington. Does anyone pretend that for fifty or sixty or seventy-five dollars a month and sixty days' employment a citizen of California could be expected to pay railroad fare across the continent and come to the city of Washington for such a job? Think of a man coming from Colorado or any distant State under such circumstances!

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator where he finds in this bill any provision that the term of appointment shall expire in sixty days?

Mr. CARTER. I find it in the necessary condition to be brought about by the bill itself. That will be manifest from a consideration of the measure and the purposes it is intended to serve.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator expect that the commissions of the director and assistant director will expire in sixty days?

Mr. CARTER. Not at all, because the director is required by the terms of the bill to prepare a plan and to submit it to Congress at the earliest practicable date.

Mr. TELLER. This bill provides for a permanent census bureau, does it not? If that be so, there is no reason for saying that these people will not continue to hold office under the bill.

Mr. CARTER. But there is reason for saying that this bill contemplates another bill, under which the permanent census work is to be conducted; and it is for the purpose of providing a plan, devising the method, and enlightening Congress upon the breadth and width and extent of the scheme to be employed that this preliminary bill is projected.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say that it is not a preliminary bill.

Mr. HOAR. Is it not expected that the new bill will provide for the continuance of the force to be employed under this bill?

Mr. CARTER. Not necessarily, because it will devolve upon Congress to say precisely what conditions shall apply, to be fixed by future legislation.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to read from the bill?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. It provides that the clerical force, to which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] desires to apply the civil-service system, shall consist of thirty-two clerks as a temporary office force. I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to that.

Then section 4 provides:

That it shall be the duty of the director of the census to submit to the Secretary of the Treasury, on or before October 1, 1897—

Which date will be altered—estimates for such classified force as he may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

So the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] is right in saying that this force of thirty-one clerks is merely a temporary force, and that the whole organization of the census is to be provided for by a future bill.

Mr. CARTER. Undoubtedly it is to be.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he expects the thirty-two clerks to be discharged at the end of sixty days?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not; but so far as this proposed law is concerned, they are notified that they are temporary employees.

Furthermore, if the Senator from Montana will allow me—and he has anticipated much of what I intended to say—this whole contention, which is now as to thirty-one clerks, which is the maximum force under this bill, is as to the clerks who are hereafter to be employed when the permanent office force shall be authorized by Congress. No one pretends that the enumerators engaged in carrying out the census work are to be employed according to the civil-service rules. There will be 30,000, more or less, of those, and they are not to be employed, nobody recommends that they shall be employed, as the result of a competitive civil-service examination. If the Senator from Massachusetts is right as to the injury that will be done by the exercise of the discretion of the director of the census in his selection of his clerical force, what woe and misfortune is to come to the census and to the country by the selection of 32,000 in the same manner!

The Senator will allow me to say in conclusion that, while I shall vote to apply the existing civil-service rules of the Government, under suitable conditions, to the clerical force of the Government, I think the civil-service system has been extended far beyond reason and to an extent which needs curtailment.

It seems to me to be absurd, Mr. President, to undertake to raise this question on this bill, which only provides for employing some thirty-six selected gentlemen to inaugurate the business of taking the next census.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire has so well and with such force elucidated this point that it seems needless to go further than to say that one of the most serious difficulties encountered by the superintendent of the last census, one of the most prolific causes of difficulty in the taking of the census arose from the fact that an organization was not in existence when the director was appointed. The director was not appointed until a very brief time before the actual work of enumeration was required. In consequence, within an incredibly short period of time Superintendent Porter was called upon to organize out of raw material, selected at random over the country as best it could be selected, a force of 50,000 people, to do a technical work of very great moment to the country, provided it was accurately taken and promptly reported.

Whether it was accurately performed is a question which can probably never be settled, but that the results have been tardy in reaching the country is so notorious as not to admit of any question at all. A portion of the results of the census taken in May, 1890, are to-day wrapped up in the musty records of the Census Office and have not seen the light of day in print. Statistics, in this rapid age of ours, ten years old are of no practical value whatever.

Now, it is the purpose of the committee having this matter in charge to-day—and upon that the committee is unanimous—that we should as a matter of ordinary economy provide in due season for the organization of this force in a regular, prudent, substantial, and intelligent manner, so that the great haste, the wasteful haste, which attended the last census may not be inflicted upon the country and the force in the present case.

This preliminary bill merely contemplates the establishment of a bureau, the appointment of a director, an assistant director, a few statisticians, and such clerical force as may be essential to assist them temporarily in projecting a plan to be submitted to Congress during, we hope, the present session. When that plan shall have been submitted, by the very terms of the bill the right is reserved in Congress to prescribe the method of taking the census, the field the inquiry shall cover, the manner in which the questions shall be propounded, and the general work, without any limitation whatever because of the pending bill.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Montana permit me to ask him a question in this connection?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. If I understand the Senator, the bill does not propose to deal with the extent of the inquiry or the subjects upon which the census is to be taken?

Mr. CARTER. It does not so propose; and, fearing that some such construction might be placed upon it, it is expressly provided by the terms of the bill that Congress reserves the right exclusively unto itself to determine the scope of the census.

Mr. BERRY. The reason I asked the question is that I received a letter in which it was stated to be the purpose of the Census Committee to prevent an investigation by the next census similar to what was known as the home and farm inquiry in the last census. I desire to ask the Senator if there is anything in the bill which would in any way prevent or prohibit Congress from directing that inquiry to be made when the matter comes before it hereafter?

Mr. CARTER. There is nothing whatever in the bill which would prevent that inquiry.

Mr. BERRY. It does not undertake to deal at all with the subjects upon which the inquiry shall be made?

Mr. CARTER. It does not undertake so to deal.

For the purpose of enabling Congress at the present session to legislate upon this subject and provide by appropriate enactments for the taking of the census, the organization of the bureau in the manner indicated, it is hoped that the pending bill may receive consideration and be passed at an early date. Upon analysis of its provisions it will be clearly perceived that as to the civil-service proposition it does not involve any elementary principle, nor does it commit Congress to the special examination indicated in the bill, to the selection through the civil service, or to any other method of selecting the employees. That can be disposed of in the bill which finally provides for taking the census.

This leads me to suggest that immediately after the holidays I will endeavor to secure prompt consideration of the bill, and I will say to such Senators as desire to address themselves to the civil-service feature, which seems to be a prolific source of discussion, that when the main bill comes forward the subject will be properly before the Senate covering the entire census operation, and remarks can then be submitted without detaining the initiatory movement for the census.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 16, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 15, 1897.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 15, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to present the following resolution for the holiday recess, and to ask immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, the 18th day of December, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Wednesday, January 5, 1898.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DINGLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

PAY OF OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FOR DECEMBER.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 103) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1897, on the 17th day of said month.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and instructed to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of December, 1897, on the 17th day of said month.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ODELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, by recent order of the House, for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 4751. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has the floor.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remaining portion of my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee, in the consideration of the pending bill, was confronted with a condition that should never exist in this country, a country so diversified in its resources that it should have at all times in its Treasury funds sufficient to meet the legitimate expenses of the Government. This side of the House is in no way responsible for this condition. We have a tariff bill (the Dingley bill) that can not, and never will, produce sufficient revenue to meet the increasing expenses of this great and expanding country. Your committee, Mr. Chairman, was compelled to ignore the carefully prepared estimates of the heads of Departments and bureaus under instructions from the Executive Office not to increase estimates so as to enlarge appropriations. In my opinion, Congress will be compelled to amend the existing revenue laws or cease to appropriate the money necessary to meet the demands of a reasonable and economic administration of government. We must have a revenue-tariff law, simple, ample, and impartial, if the expenses of the Government are to be provided for promptly and adequately.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss either the tariff bill or this bill at large now. I wish to bring to the attention of this committee and the country the condition of the civil-service law, and the necessary reformation or amendment that ought to be made thereto. But we find, Mr. Chairman, in the President's closing sentence in his message, a recommendation of economy and no increase in the appropriations, and yet from the Executive Office came a large increased estimate in the way of salaries and increased salaries and exactions all the way down, with but one exception, in every Department and in every bureau. This increase covers 173 salaries and amounts to $600,000.

Now, one of two facts exists. Either in this bill we have crippled the service by not giving these increased appropriations, or else the Republican party as administered now is certainly chargeable with extravagance.

Which is true time alone will develop. But as this civil-service question will be discussed in Committee of the Whole quite extensively in a few days, or perhaps in a few hours, I want to suggest that the civil-service law as it stands now and as it is now administered is a humbug and a fraud upon the people and the country. It is not civil service, but, as the distinguished gentleman from Illinois suggested yesterday, it is "uncivil service."

In the hearings before the subcommittee that constructed this bill, gentlemen will find that the commissioners themselves admitted that they were powerless to enforce the law in some instances. Why should we have a civil-service board handicapped to such an extent that they can not enforce the plain law and the plain regulations made by the President? The question was propounded to Mr. Procter, the president of the Civil Service Board, whether these amendments or suspensions by the different Presidents from 1883 up to the present time had been always for the good of the service? He thought so; but when his attention was directed to the suspension by Mr. Harrison of the railway mail clerks that Mr. Cleveland had covered into the civil service at a given time, he said that was unfortunate and wrong. As the matter stands, your President, and our President, if we have a Democrat occupying that chair, can mutilate and divert and do anything that he pleases with the civil service, by covering in or turning out certain classes of employees.

Now, that ought not to be allowed. Again, we developed in these hearings that the plan of "promotion" which is practiced, taking a $900 clerk and putting him up to $1,800 and taking an $1,800 clerk and putting him down to $900, is nothing more nor less than making transfers for political reasons. They will take an $1,800 Democratic clerk and make him a $900 clerk, and, vice versa, they will take a $900 Republican clerk and make him an $1,800 clerk. We asked the commissioners if that was a violation of the law and they said plainly and positively that it was. We asked the commission another question, whether the heads of bureaus and of Departments were following now the civil-service rules and regulations, or if they were not decapitating Democrats and putting in Republicans. He said yes, especially in the Pension Bureau, under Mr. H. Clay Evans. We asked the president of the commission again if the board needed amendments to the law so as to be able to enforce it. He said certainly they did, that they needed them badly.

I have only a minute or two more, but I want to suggest one amendment which ought to be made—that is, that everybody under class No. 1 and over class No. 4 and railway mail clerks and mail carriers ought to be taken out of the operation of the civil-service rules. That was the original intention of the act of 1883. The law as now administered covers laborers and workmen, but it was never so intended.

The act of 1883 says specifically and positively that laborers and workmen are not covered by its provisions, and yet the law is applied to them. It is applied to deputy marshals and to clerks and deputies and chiefs of division and assistant chiefs. All of these ought to be taken out. Then the civil-service law ought to be amended in this particular if in no other: That no person affected by it or under its operation should be removed except upon written charges and a hearing. If the head of a Department or the chief of a bureau sees fit to dismiss an employee, let the party affected have the right of appeal to the Board of Civil Service Commissioners, and let their judgment be final. That would take the civil service out of politics and keep it out to a very great extent.

In this bill, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we have cut, and cut largely, more largely in the Pension Bureau than in any other. We got the head of the Bureau to agree to a cut of $115,000 or $116,000, which is not in the bill, but which will be presented on the floor as an amendment by the gentleman in charge of the bill. We ought to have been able to persuade him to agree to a cut of a million dollars.

In the morning paper it is stated that the Treasury Department proposes to take care of its old, disabled, and inefficient clerks.

How? By putting them all on a $900 list, and practically retiring them. If you do nothing about this matter for ten years to come, you will have perhaps 30 or 40 per cent of the clerks now in the Departments to be treated in just that way, and you will have to put them on a civil service pension roll, or, in order to dodge that, you will be compelled to do what the Treasury proposes to do now, class them as $900 clerks and give them light work, which means practically no work at all. What are you going to do about it? If you examine the hearings before the subcommittee, you will see the whole question unraveled and opened up. You gentlemen on the other side of the House have the power. We wait with patience to see what you propose to do about it.

Mr. POWERS. May I ask the gentleman a question? Does this order of the Treasury Department to which he has referred come about by the operation of the civil-service law?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, sir. It comes about as the legitimate result of the operation of the civil-service law.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time and return it to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve my time and ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to proceed. I observe that the gentleman is otherwise engaged, and while waiting for him, I may say, in connection with the criticism I offered yesterday in respect to the estimates of the Departments exceeding the appropriations, that the Departments are merely following the custom which has obtained in this respect.

I think it is not a wise custom to make estimates in excess of the needs of the public service; but that custom of the Departments is amply illustrated by precedents.

I did not desire to include in the criticism all of the Departments, because some of them have exercised a little more scrutiny than others. I have knowledge, especially, of the Treasury Department; and, while I do not desire to make invidious distinctions, I may be pardoned for commending the careful estimates which have been submitted by the present Secretary of the Treasury, who, in my judgment, is an accomplished administrative officer.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield ten minutes of my time to my colleague, Judge DE ARMOND.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I wish for only a few minutes to invite the attention of the House to a matter that has been before it informally a number of times, and that I think ought to be before it formally very soon. It is not connected with this bill, but in the latitude given for general debate upon these measures I think it is not inappropriate to refer to it now. The question to which I refer—one which has been pending here for some months, and which seems to me an important matter—is the Senate resolution for the recognition of belligerency between the Cubans and the Spaniards—the recognition of a state of war in the Island of Cuba.

Mr. Chairman, I think I can not be mistaken in my conclusion that the American people, without distinction of party, are in favor of action upon this resolution, and favorable action upon it. It is not for me to suggest why there was no action upon it in the long months of last summer, when this House apparently had time "to burn" and could easily have acted. It is a fact, I think, that war has prevailed in that unhappy island for a considerable space of time. Not war in the ordinary acceptation of the term; not as war has raged between civilized communities in civilized times; but a war upon the one side of heroism, devoted to the cause of freedom and independence, and war upon the other side characterized by all the cruelties and all the infamies known to devastation in the darkest ages of the world.

We forget, I fear, Mr. Chairman, that there were times in the struggle of our fathers for independence in this country when the sky was dark and when the prospect was forbidding. Suppose there had been a close scrutiny of our prospects in the days of Valley Forge, in the days just preceding the crossing of the Delaware by Washington and his small band of patriots, or in other of the dark and trying hours of the Revolution. Suppose the prospects of freedom in this country had been gauged then as some gentlemen gauge now the prospects in Cuba, the decision might not have been in our favor.

Always has it been, Mr. Chairman, whenever a comparatively small body of people, under great disadvantages, beset by great difficulties, undergoing great privations, are carrying on heroic war, desperate war, for the achievement of independence, that the powers that be and that scatter news, the selfish agencies interested in maintaining a condition that ought not to exist, and in preventing a condition which ought to exist, give a false impression to the world as to the true state of affairs.

Every hour, Mr. Chairman, that we delay action upon that resolution we are lending aid to oppression from beyond the water, and we are doing what we may do to stifle freedom and to bring to naught the struggles of patriots here, within sight almost of our own shores. Liberty is contagious, just as tyranny is contagious. Liberty expands and spreads, just as tyranny may be expanded and spread. The idea that there is some obligation resting upon this country to be gentle and considerate in its dealings with Spain, when that gentleness and that consideration for the Spaniard are cruelty and torture and death for the Cuban—that idea, it seems to me, is not well founded in American manhood or American patriotism.

How great would be the stain upon our national honor, how great would be the loss to the cause of freedom the world over, if, by our indifference, by our disposition to placate the Spaniard, striving desperately to defeat and ruin the Cuban, that hopeful struggle for freedom should end in failure and that desperate effort to perpetuate tyranny and outrage upon the Western Hemisphere should triumph! How dark would be the page in American history upon which should be written the story that through the indifference of our Government Cuba fell, the spoil and the prey of the tyrant, and that her gallant people have fastened upon them, riveted so strongly that this generation can not hope to see the breaking of the chains, the bonds of slavery!

What have we to fear, what have we to lose? Why ought not this House and this Congress to voice the sentiments of our constituents? Are the American people wrong? Are these men—Democrats, Republicans, Populists, by whose votes we are upon this floor—are they wrong, are they vicious? Are their aspirations for freedom for themselves and for these struggling patriots in Cuba ill-founded and visionary? Ah, they are right. The masses of the people are right all the time if they can be fairly heard and fairly understood. They are right because they are for freedom and justice. They are right because they are for the triumph elsewhere of the same principles that have triumphed in this country, and have given it all the glory and all the honor that it has in history. They are right, because with the keen instinct of the patriot, with the keen instinct of the lover of liberty they realize, if they do not all put it in correct formula, that the loss of liberty, the triumph of tyranny, the perpetuation of slavery in Cuba will be a menace to freedom and progress here and the world over.

We owe a great duty to the world, Mr. Chairman. We are the giant republic, the leader of the nations that are devoted to the welfare of human kind. We here have been given the holy task of carrying high the flag of freedom and lighting the fires of liberty on the hilltops; of furnishing an example to the nations of the earth that shall be the beacon light to which in the darkest hours of storm and peril the mariner, tossed upon the ocean of conflicting ideas and hopes and fears, may ever direct his gaze; and seeing that light beaming over the wilderness of waters, undimmed and ever steady, shall take hope for greater exertion, and guided by that light shall achieve greater results.

I hope, as an American, not as a partisan, that the House may grant us the privilege of having a vote on that Senate resolution, that declaration of our freedom from Spanish influences, that declaration that patriotism in Cuba has been and is fighting. A splendid tribute of American manhood is due to Cuban manhood, such manhood as is the pride of the liberty-loving people of this Republic. I hope that the distress and the sacrifices of other liberty-loving people in Cuba shall draw from us here some substantial evidence of sympathy; that sympathy which is warm in the hearts of our constituents. Shall we refuse, by an act in behalf of justice and liberty, to gladden the great heart of American patriotism and to inspire the struggling people of Cuba with new hopes and higher aspirations and firmer determination? Let us flash freedom's light into the cruel storm of conflict through which they are passing, those Cuban patriots so glorious and so memorable in the history of the human race. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. STEELE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 57. An act for the relief of the heirs of Jacob R. Davis;

S. 1749. An act to provide for the purchase of a site, and the erection of a public building thereon, at Durham, in the State of North Carolina;

S. 415. An act for the relief of Anna W. Osborne;

S. 364. An act granting settlers the right to make second homestead entries;

S. 2074. An act providing for the erection of an addition to the public building at Los Angeles, Cal., and appropriating money therefor;

S. 884. An act for the relief of Mrs. Harriet D. Newson;

S. R. 53. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the mayor of the city of Milwaukee, for use in ornamenting one of the parks of that city, the Parrott rifled cannon and carriage recently used on the revenue cutter Andrew Johnson; and

S. 383. An act granting an increase of pension to William W. Tumblin, of Bradford County, Fla.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have standing to my credit fourteen minutes of time in the general debate. I yield seven to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I desire at this time to call the attention of the committee to a most extraordinary proposition which has been advanced by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Vanderlip, in what appears to be an authorized interview in the columns of the Washington Post.

Mr. BINGHAM. Of what date?

Mr. MOODY. Of this morning.

In that interview the Secretary proposes to establish in the Treasury Department here in Washington what in effect is a civil pension list. He points out that under existing conditions a large number of clerks in the Treasury Department, while deserving much credit for their work and services in the past, have outgrown their usefulness, and he says:

> The tree has become dead at the top, as it were—

he says.

He tells us that there are sixty or seventy persons in the Treasury Department who are over 70 years of age, all of whom he would apparently have us believe are incapable of further public service. He says that the Treasury Department proposes to reduce these clerks from their present positions to that of $900 clerks, and uses this suggestive language:

> They will be given $900 a year, or a practical pension of $75 per month, which will enable them all to live comfortably—and this without a word or a syllable of authority from Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who, without reservation, believe in what is commonly known as the merit system of the civil service. But I believe the proposition which has been advanced by a high official of one of the Departments of the Government deserves to be met by Congress at the very threshold. If it is true that we have any system of the public service the logical result of which is the establishment of a civil pension list, then it is true that the American people, by a majority of 100 to 1, stand ready to wipe out that system. [Applause.]

But I fear I have invoked applause that I do not, in the opinion of those from whom it came, deserve. I say this because I do not believe that the act of 1883 and its logical development does lead to the establishment of the civil pension list.

Mr. FARIS. Including the rules?

Mr. MOODY. Including the rules as they have been established heretofore.

Mr. BUTLER. How about the rules now?

Mr. MOODY. If they lead to it, they ought to be changed. I was told by a man who knows the civil-service system probably as well as any other man in Washington that, hour for hour of the time actually employed in work, the subordinate force in the service of the Government here were paid 100 per cent more in money than they could get in any corresponding private employment throughout the country.

From the experience that I have had in service on the Committee on Appropriations, I am led to believe that that is true. Those men and women who are getting that pay ought to be compelled themselves to make provision for their old age. This nation retires the officers of its Army and Navy at 64 years of age, and under the provisions of that law it has retired Sherman and Sheridan, with every other officer. There ought not to be any administration of any law, or any law which will permit any administration, which will retain in the public service people who no longer are able to render an equivalent for the pay which is given them.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this declaration of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury will meet with the disapproval of the American people, and I want to say here and now, as a friend of civil-service reform, that the worst enemy of that system is not the gentleman from Ohio who sits at my side [Mr. GROSVENOR], but if this is to be the policy of this administration in the Treasury Department, if this declaration is approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, its worst enemy sits in the Cabinet by the side of President McKinley. [Applause.] And I call upon all throughout this country who believe with me that it is essential that the merit system should be preserved to rise up in protest against this perversion of its spirit, this encroachment upon the rights of the people.

Mr. FARIS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. QUIGG. I should like to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MOODY. I do; certainly.

Mr. QUIGG. The merit system, to which the gentleman says he gives his approval, is a system, if I understand it, which says that politics must have nothing whatever to do with the way in which a man enters the service; that no consideration must be given to political indorsement; that he must be appointed as a result of a competitive examination, and as the result of his attaining a certain position upon an eligible list, by virtue of which position he enters the service.

Then the rules of the Civil Service Commission say that, having entered the service, a man must be promoted as the result of similar processes, and finally that he must not be removed except upon charges relating strictly and solely to the performance of his duties, and in no respect relating to politics. That is what the gentleman styles the merit system, which he says he is in favor of. Now, does not the gentleman think that it is infinitely brutal, under such a system, to throw a man out when he has given his life to the service, and at a time when it is absolutely impossible for him to do any other business than the business which he has been giving his life to, simply because he is old and feeble and can not work any longer? If you are going to have that system, is not a pension list inevitable and most appropriate and necessary?

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question of the gentleman from New York, I will say, in the first place, in my opinion, it is not brutal to turn a man out of the public service when he no longer has the capacity to serve the public, and it is especially not brutal if he has served the public long at a salary double that which he could earn in private life; and, in the second place, I say, in answer to the second branch of the question, that in my opinion the present system does not lead to civil pensions, and because a pension system is proposed for the first time in this country I desire to stand at the threshold and as a friend of the merit system protest against it. I believe that that answers the gentleman's question.

I append the article to which I have referred, by leave of the House.

AGED CLERKS REDUCED—MOVEMENT TO INCREASE TREASURY EFFICIENCY—AMOUNTS TO A PENSION SCHEME—EMPLOYEES OVER 70 YEARS OF AGE HOLDING HIGHER POSITIONS WILL BE CUT DOWN TO $900—OFFICIALS WILL BE LAX WITH THEM, AND SMALL PRIVILEGES WILL BE ALLOWED—NEED OF NEW BLOOD IS FELT—A DELICATE MATTER.

A movement which it is believed will result in adding to the efficiency of the working force of the Treasury Department has been inaugurated by the officials of that branch of the Government service. The plan is practically a pension scheme for the old employees who have become infirm from service.

This scheme, to be carried out within the law, has been so arranged that the veteran clerks of both sexes will remain in harness, but all over 70 years of age shall be reduced to $900 per annum and given light work. When seen last night, Assistant Secretary Vanderlip explained the plan in detail to a reporter for the Post.

"It is a very delicate matter," he said. "The facts are, though, that there are a large number of clerks in the Treasury Department who, while deserving much credit for their work and service of the past, have outgrown their usefulness. The tree has become dead at the top, as it were. In one auditor's office we found that a majority of the clerks employed there are over 50 years of age, and that the office is badly in need of young blood.

"This condition of affairs is a menace to the civil service. These people are allowed to hold high positions and draw big salaries while their work is not up to the standard of younger employees drawing smaller salaries. It is a hard thing for the old men to realize that their usefulness is fading, and it is also hard to expect a bureau chief to tell the old men they must get out. They simply won't do it.

HONORARY SERVICE ROLL.

"We have been thinking the matter over, and have decided on applying somewhat the same lines to the Treasury as hold in the Army, police and fire departments, for instance; a form of compulsory retirement, or as near that as we can get. There is no law allowing us to retire clerks on half pay, and it would be too much of a hardship to turn the old people out entirely. In looking around to see what we could do in the matter we have had in view the thought of an honorary service roll, on which all the employees, men and women, over 70 years of age, will be placed.

"It will be known that the officials will be lax with these people. If the old man has an attack of rheumatism or something else detains him and he gets to the office a trifle late, why nothing will be said. There is no law allowing us to give them shorter hours, but it will be known that everything will be made as comfortable as possible for them.

"They will be given $900 a year, or a practical pension of $75 per month, which will enable all to live confortably. There is naturally much objection to the rule. None will be convinced of the fact that they are getting old, and will insist that their long service makes them all the more fit for their respective positions. A few have voluntarily accepted the situation, but a majority are, of course, objecting.

UNIFORM RULE BETTER.

"Whether the rule will be generally enforced or not has not been decided. There are some men at 70 who are still efficient. But, on the other hand, if we discriminate, some of the older ones will bring in pressure to show that they are just as good as the other fellow. It would be better to have a uniform rule for all over 70, but we have not fully made up our minds on that point. We have talked with the Civil Service Commission and with numerous Congressmen on the subject, and they all agree that it is a good thing. There are 60 or 70 employees over 70 years old in the Department. We are trying to do the best we can by the faithful clerks, and at the same time to add to the efficiency of the service."

There is much rejoicing at the Department among the young clerks over the prospect of nearly seventy promotions, but the older ones are not in the best frame of mind over the matter.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has control of the time on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DOCKERY. I had thought, Mr. Chairman, of making some observations in reference to the civil service, in reply to my colleague on the committee [Mr. MOODY], but I do not want to disturb the delightful harmony at this time prevailing on the other side, so I will defer my observations and yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, this bill makes the appropriation to pay the expenses of the Civil Service Commission. I wish to call the attention of the House to the action of the Senate Census Committee, which action, I think, has an important bearing upon this question. I am informed by Senator TURPIE of Indiana, who is an honored and able member of that committee, that that committee has just voted not to permit the application of the civil-service system to the employees engaged in taking the next census, and that motion was supported by two of the distinguished Republican members of that committee. That is the view that the Senate committee takes with reference to the application of the civil-service rules to a very important branch of the Government service.

The same distinguished Senator says that it never has been applied to the taking of the census in the past and that the clerical work of the census has been of the very best. Now, if we can get the very best service in that branch without the application of the civil service, why can we not get it in the service of the other Departments of the Government?

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the service in taking the census was the very best?

Mr. SIMS. The clerical service. That is my information from a member of that committee, and that member is Senator TURPIE of Indiana, if I did not misunderstand him.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to the gentleman that during the taking of the last census it devolved upon the Committee on Appropriations to recommend appropriations for that purpose, and one of the reasons given for the enormous expense incurred in taking that census was that the Superintendent of the Census had to act rapidly and select his force from every portion of the country and under pressure from Senators and Representatives, and that he could not get the very best service under such circumstances.

Mr. SIMS. I am only stating what was stated to me. I do not know the facts personally. But I am making this argument: If it be true that the civil service ought not to be applied to the census, why should it be applied to like service of the Government in other respects? If we are not going to save money by refusing the appropriations, the question is, How are we going to get the money?

I want to quote from Senator ALDRICH'S speech in reporting the tariff bill, on May 26, 1897:

> In the years to come we must expect a decrease rather than an increase in the customs revenue to be derived under the principal schedules of the tariff. The legitimate result of a protective policy is to give the American market to American producers. When this becomes an accomplished fact, the revenue growing out of protective duties disappears. It must be evident, therefore, that we must look to other sources of revenue.

Now, if it be true of our present financial policy, and one of its distinguished authors admits that its success as a protective measure means its failure as a revenue measure, we must either look to other sources for revenue or we must prevent the cause which leads to the need of revenue. If the civil-service law is no benefit to the country, why encumber it with the expense? We have got to look to other sources of revenue to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government as it stands.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. What does our Civil Service Commission cost per year to maintain it?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know.

Mr. LOW. About a hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. SIMS. About a hundred thousand dollars a year, I am informed.

Mr. COX. Will my colleague allow me? I have the exact amount here—$98,340.

Mr. SIMS. I am informed that it is $98,000. It is of no benefit to the country, according to the contention of many; and why continue it? How are we going to meet the burdens in the future with a revenue law that upon its face admits that if it is a success as a protective measure it must prove to be a failure as a revenue measure?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand I have two and a half minutes remaining to my credit.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two and a half minutes remaining.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield that time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with some interest to what the gentleman who has just taken his seat has said. Personally, I have the highest respect for Senator TURPIE. He is very much of a gentleman, and he is a man of considerable ability; but I want to inform the gentleman who has just spoken that on the subject of civil service I fear that Senator TURPIE is at fault and that he does not in that particular represent the most advanced thought and conservative judgment of the people of the great State of Indiana. It is news to me that the administration of the last Census Office was conducted upon a high plane of efficiency.

I have always understood, and I know at one time it was a matter of common report and common complaint, that under the system which prevailed in the Census Office the service was not up to the highest standard, and did not begin to compare in point of thoroughness with the service rendered in the classified service of the Government. If it be true, as just stated, that any committee of the Senate of the United States has voted to place the taking of the next census outside of the protection of the civil service, then it is an unfortunate thing for the census and an unfortunate thing for the people of this country.

It is simply an advertisement that the work is to be inefficiently done, and it is a further declaration that the system of spoils and bartering of office, which has disgraced the annals of our people as no other thing has ever disgraced them, is very likely to be perpetuated so far as that branch of our service is concerned. The civil-service law and regulations are by all odds the greatest and surest safeguards against the prostitution of office to political purposes, and any other method of making appointments is quite sure to be less satisfactory and far more open to evasion.

Mr. Chairman, I have seen the newspaper article published this morning in the Washington Post and adverted to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY]. I confess I share with him in the indignation which he felt when he read that article. I have not the honor of very great personal acquaintance with the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; I do not know whether he favors the civil-service law or opposes it; but I do know that he has, if correctly quoted, dropped a very unfortunate remark just at this juncture in public affairs, one that is entirely out of line with the thoughts and convictions of all those who are true friends of the civil service.

I do know that he has thereby demonstrated his utter incapacity to administer the civil-service law. I do know that if his chief will do his duty to this Administration, to the declarations of the Republican platform, and to the Republican party itself, and to the people of this country, irrespective of party, he will lay the hand of gentle admonition upon his shoulder and say to him that no advocate of genuine civil-service reform ever contemplates establishing a pension list, either directly or indirectly, for those who are serving the country in its civil service, and that it would be well for him to be a little more guarded in his utterances hereafter. I repudiate the idea of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in toto, and no man shall come before this House and insist without contradiction that the civil-service advocates favor or that the civil-service law authorizes anything of the kind whatever.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, with the permission of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is exhausted.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana be allowed five minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not want five minutes. Two will be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the time of the gentleman from Indiana will be extended for two minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman if the life tenure does not inevitably lead to a pension list from the civilian walks of life?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. It does not inevitably do so. I believe that in the mother country they have established something of that kind, but the gentleman must understand that our Government, while it takes the system of the mother country as a basis, has built a superstructure which, while adopting the meritorious parts of her system, has rejected those things that we believed to be crude and unwise.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not true that the Departments have already practically adopted a civil pension system by reducing the salaries of the old clerks?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. If they have done that, they have violated the civil-service law and its principle, its spirit, and its letter, and they deserve the severest condemnation that every true advocate of civil-service reform can visit upon them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask a few minutes more.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall be glad to vote to give the gentleman the additional time if he will allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I will hear the gentleman's question in a moment.

Mr. PEARSON. Does not the gentleman know that the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform of this House and of this Congress has drawn up a very elaborate bill establishing a civil pension by a fund to be contributed by the employees in the civil service?

Mr. BROSIUS. That is not correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I can answer the gentleman. I know that the chairman has not done so. I know that there is a bill pending here in some of the committees providing that there shall be deducted from the pay of the clerks a certain amount of money monthly, which is to go to them when they reach an advanced period in life. That does not pension them, but I am opposed to it, and I say that I am confident no such bill as that can pass this House, or can pass the Senate, or can obtain the sanction of the Executive, or be placed upon the statute books of the United States.

Mr. QUIGG. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I will yield if my time can be extended.

Mr. BINGHAM. We have not time for that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I am notified that my time will not be extended, and I therefore decline to yield further. I say again, sir, that no genuine advocate of civil service ever contemplated that there should be a pension roll for the employees in the civil service in this country. The civil service is neither administered for the purpose of caring for men in their old age nor for the purpose of educating men for the duties of life outside of the Government employ. It demands an equivalent for the salaries that it pays. It expects that men shall be competent for the duties they undertake, and shall be retained in office as long as they are competent to discharge those duties, but that when, either from defect of mind or infirmity of body, they fail to give an equivalent, then, under the spirit and the letter of the law, they must make way for men who can properly discharge the duties required. Gentlemen talk about this being a brutal system——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I now call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The general debate is exhausted. The Clerk will now read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I should have liked just a minute or two longer.

Mr. BINGHAM. I call for the regular order.

The Clerk, proceeding to read the bill, read the following:

Office of Secretary: For Secretary of the Senate, including compensation as disbursing officer of the contingent fund of the Senate, $5,000, and for compensation as disbursing officer of salaries of Senators, $396; hire of horse and wagon for the Secretary's office, $700; chief clerk and financial clerk, at $3,000 each, and $500 additional for the financial clerk while the office is held by the present incumbent; principal clerk, minute and journal clerk, and enrolling clerk, at $2,592 each; assistant financial clerk, and reading clerk, at $2,400 each; librarian, $2,220, and $280 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent; assistant librarian, $1,800; six clerks, at $2,220 each; five clerks, at $2,100 each; keeper of stationery, $2,102.40; assistant keeper of stationery, $1,800; assistant in stationery room, $1,000, and $200 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent; two messengers, at $1,440 each; assistant messenger, $1,200; five laborers, at $720 each; in all, $66,074.40.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, is this bill open to discussion now?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is open for amendment and debate by the five-minute rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I move to amend by striking out the last two words of the paragraph just read.

Mr. Chairman, I want to conclude what I was saying a moment ago when the fall of the gavel compelled me to stop. This talk about a pension list in the civil service is a mere device in order to distract the attention of the people from the real issue involved in this effort to repeal or materially impair the provisions of the civil-service law. It is a bugaboo that is conjured up for the purpose of frightening men and compelling them to recede from their honest convictions on this subject.

I repeat, in language which I seek to make as emphatic as possible, that neither the spirit nor the letter of the civil-service law contemplates that there should be a pension list of those who are in the Government service in the United States. This reform does not proceed upon the proposition that it is either the right or the duty of the Government to maintain an incompetent employee who is indigent in his place, whether he is young, in middle life, or in old age. It is not founded upon the idea that the Government is a charitable institution. It proceeds upon the theory that the Government is entitled to the minds and the bodies of those most capable in clerical work in American life; that so long as it receives their services it is willing to make proper compensation; but that whenever it comes about that an employee of the Government under civil service is lacking in intelligence or in physical strength or in morals so that he can not longer discharge his duties, that moment his further retention is unjust to the American people and that he ought to give way.

Gentlemen say it is a hardship and brutality under the civil-service law to turn old employees out without pensioning them after they have served the Government faithfully for years. Not at all. The Government expects that men in Government employ, like men in the employ of corporations or individuals, shall, while they are receiving the good salaries which Government employees receive, lay up a little money for a rainy day, so as to be able to provide for themselves when the time comes that no one can afford to employ them because of their lack of capacity for work.

Mr. LINNEY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me now. I have but a little time.

What is the hardship in that? No gentleman can justly complain of it. Gentlemen undertake to seek refuge behind the humanities; but the humanities are more desperately violated under "the spoils system," which would put in office a man when utterly incompetent and retain him there through official influence, even against the remonstrance of the head of the Department, who may know that the employee is not giving the Government value received. The spoils system would not tolerate penniless old age for one instant, but would thrust out of office the employee, whether rich or poor, old or young, the very moment that he lost his influence, changed his political conviction, or that a new party came into power not of the same political faith as the employee himself. The spoils system has use for men so long only as they can devote themselves to the politicians who put them in office, and discharges them regardless of their infirmities, their age, or their poverty the very moment they cease to be useful to such influences.

Certainly it is not necessary to stand on this floor and argue this proposition any longer to intelligent men. We will meet the question of a pension for the civil service when it comes, if indeed it ever does come at all, and when the issue is made you will find that of all men on earth the men who are the most strenuous advocates of civil-service reform in this Government will be the most uncompromising in their opposition to any effort to fasten upon the American people such a pension list. This claim of a pension list is simply another one of those fallacious and specious arguments which will not bear the test of impartial investigation and which are being advanced just now by those who believe in overthrowing the merit system and substituting the spoils system in its place.

I am sorry to have to believe that there may be some gentlemen in the great Departments of this Government where the classified service exists who are only too fond of insidiously giving the influence which they possess for the accomplishment of their purpose. I think the extract read from the Post this morning makes it apparent that public functionaries should be a little careful about their expressions, even if their sympathies are where they ought to be, as administrative officers of the Government, in behalf of the proper, impartial, and honorable execution of the civil-service law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PAYNE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4752) making appropriations to provide for certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2365) "to amend the Indian appropriation act of June 7, 1897, and for other purposes."

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, I have watched the development of civil-service reform, so called, with a great deal of interest during the last ten years, and my experience with other advocates of this system leads me to entertain the liveliest confidence that my friend from Massachusetts, supported by my friend from Indiana, will presently be supporting a civil pension list. I know that they are very much opposed to it now, but I remember that all the advocates of the original law when it was before Congress asserted that it was not much of a law; that it related to only a few paltry offices here and there; that at the very outside 10,000 were all that would be included then or at any time under the operations of the act of 1883. Yet the Civil Service Commission comes before us now, when it has about 90,000 offices classified, with the assurance that the law will not be complete until it includes 150,000 offices, or practically all that are not Presidential appointments confirmed by the Senate.

So, Mr. Chairman, this system as it grows is bound to have but one result; the civil pension list is bound to come. And, sir, if the system be retained it ought to come.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] says the Government is not unlike an individual in respect to the services it has a right to demand of its employees. I agree with him; but if anybody had been in my service for a period of twenty, thirty, or forty years on a small salary, and had reached the age of 60 or 70 years, and was incompetent longer to discharge his duties to me, I should be intensely ashamed of myself if I turned him out into the streets to beg or to starve.

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion just there?

Mr. QUIGG. Certainly.

Mr. MOODY. Are we to suppose that your motive in that respect would be simply a motive of charity?

Mr. QUIGG. No, sir; but one of justice, not charity.

Mr. MOODY. Not a motive of charity?

Mr. QUIGG. No, sir; not at all. I have had this man's life, I have had his blood and nervous system; I have had all there was of him during all of the period of his active life in my service. Why should I turn him out? Why, I would not turn a dog out under such circumstances! [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption just there?

Mr. QUIGG. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Under the spoils system prevailing prior to 1883——

Mr. QUIGG (interrupting). I will answer fully and completely.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. But the gentleman has not heard my question.

Mr. QUIGG. I know the gentleman's point.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will you not permit me to submit my question?

Mr. QUIGG. Go ahead.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Under the spoils system prevailing before the act of 1883 was enacted did you ever know of any party, when it came into power under the mutations of parties in this country, that ever hesitated to turn a man out of the public service because he was poor and old, without regard to his competency for the discharge of the duties of his position, if he did not happen to agree with the party in power?

Mr. QUIGG. But the distinction under what the gentleman designates the spoils system, as applied to persons turned out of office, did not reach the incompetents only, but those persons who had served for a few years, who were entirely active, and could turn their attention immediately to their former business vocations which they left to enter the public service. They could go back to their former employment and resume the duties of life just as they had pursued them prior to their appointment in the public service.

But the difference here is very marked. They had not given their entire life up to the public duties and the public service, and were, as I have said, in a position to go back to their old work. But what the gentleman from Indiana would have would be a system under which, while a man is in the public service, he could not be removed, and there would be no way of honestly removing him except for cause. He could not be removed because the public system had changed, or because his party had gone out and another party to which he is in opposition has come in. He has got to be removed, if at all, upon charges made against him; so that, in the event that no such charges are preferred, he is bound to remain in the public service, if he performs his duty at all properly, until he gets so old that he has got to go out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. What is to prevent him from resigning?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Has the gentleman from Indiana withdrawn the pro forma amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I withdraw it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will allow me, by unanimous consent, the debate on this civil-service paragraph is to be postponed until we reach the end of the bill, after which it was agreed that we should have full debate upon this civil-service proposition. Now, in fairness to the consideration of this legislation, in fairness to the committee—the committee having stated that the broadest latitude would be allowed in debate, and that every man who desires to discuss the question would have ample time for a careful consideration of the whole proposition, perhaps running after the recess—I do ask, in the interest of good procedure, that we go on with the bill in its various paragraphs under the agreement made and not consume time now in the discussion of this particular feature.

When we come to the civil-service paragraph it will be passed over until we reach the end of the bill, and ample time will be given for debate on that provision of it. We will then have the discussion all together, so that a student or anybody desiring to take up the entire question will have it all together in a form available for examination; and so I hope—I merely throw out the suggestion—that the committee may be allowed to proceed with the bill and then take up the question of the civil service, according to the agreement that has been heretofore adopted.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] who is in charge of this bill has well said, there is nothing now pending before the House relating to the Civil Service Commission. The House, by unanimous consent, has deferred the consideration of that whole question until it shall have concluded the remaining paragraphs of the bill, and I desire to join with him in the request that we may be allowed to finish this bill. Then we can open up the whole question under general debate and have a consecutive, intelligent discussion.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman a question. We can have a full debate of the question, provided we can get ample time, but after this bill has gone through under the five-minute rule, for the part you have passed there will be no opportunity——

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman is in error. The general debate has not been concluded.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no, and ample time will be given.

Mr. SWANSON. General debate has not been closed?

Mr. BINGHAM. It has not.

Mr. SWANSON. We have assurances, then, that ample time will be given.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, those assurances have been given to the House a dozen times.

Mr. DOCKERY. They have already been given to the House, and by unanimous consent that was done. We shall have ample time, and I do hope we shall be allowed now to finish this bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the next paragraph.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to move to strike out the words on page 3, lines 16 and 17——

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will suspend until the Clerk concludes the reading of the paragraph, the Chair will then recognize him.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks and messengers to committees: For clerk of printing records, $2,220; clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, $3,000; assistant clerk, $2,220; messenger, to be appointed by the committee, $1,440; clerk and stenographer to the Committee on Finance, $2,500; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Claims, $2,220; assistant clerk, $1,440; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Commerce, $2,220; assistant clerk, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Pensions, $2,220; two assistant clerks, at $1,440 each; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on the Judiciary, $2,220; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs, $2,220; assistant clerk, $1,440; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, $2,220; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on the District of Columbia, $2,220; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Foreign Relations, $2,220; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Engrossed Bills, $2,220; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Joint Committee on the Library, $2,220; clerks to the Committees on Naval Affairs, Census, Public Lands, Indian Affairs, to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, Public Buildings and Grounds, Agriculture and Forestry, Education and Labor, Territories, Interstate Commerce, Public Health and National Quarantine, Private Land Claims, Patents, Coast Defenses, Privileges and Elections, Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, Rules, Civil Service and Retrenchment, and clerk to conference minority of the Senate, at $2,220 each; clerks to committees on Woman Suffrage, Mines and Mining, and Construction of the Nicaragua Canal, at $2,100 each; in all, $102,220.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MAXWELL] is recognized.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in lines 16 and 17, on page 3, the words "assistant clerk, $2,220." I wish to say in support of my motion that I am always glad to aid any person to obtain employment in some worthy business so that he may be enabled to support himself and those who are dependent upon him. And where it is apparent that the services of anyone are necessary, and he has been faithful in the performance of his duties, I certainly shall not vote to abolish his position. My sympathies are with the man or woman who earns a living by honest labor. A government, however, is a great business institution, and, so far at least as employment is concerned, should be conducted on business principles. We are acting here not for ourselves, but in a trust capacity for the people of the United States.

The bill provides for one clerk to the Committee on Appropriations. To that we do not object, and the salary allowed ($3,000) ought to secure a man of a high order of ability. It would seem that this one clerk could perform all the duties except those of the committee itself, which can not be delegated. There is a very large number of these appointments. Thus, in page 3, lines 17 and 18, we find: "Messenger, to be appointed by the committee, $1,440." The duties of messenger to a committee certainly can not be very onerous, and could readily and easily, I believe, be performed by the clerk. Here would be a saving of $3,460 in one committee, without, so far as I can see, impairing the efficiency of the service in the slightest degree. It will be found that this surplus of employees runs all through the bill, and that the aggregate amount of salaries proposed to be paid runs up into the hundreds of thousands of dollars, if not millions.

The evil, too, appears to be constantly growing, so that unless it is checked we may reasonably expect a considerable increase of the number, with but little for them to do. Shall we not resolutely restrict the number to those absolutely essential to perform the duties required? That certainly is our duty. There is great complaint of a deficit in the revenue, and on that professed ground the appropriation for pensions was $35,000,000 less than three years ago. Let us drop needless expenditures and there will be sufficient revenue to sustain the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BINGHAM. What is the motion?

The CHAIRMAN. To strike out, on page 3, lines 16 and 17, the words "assistant clerk, $2,220."

Mr. BINGHAM. I submit we have accepted, as is the custom of the committee and the House, the recommendations of the Senate as to their subordinate force. We claim the right in the House to indicate what salaries and what subordinate force we shall have. The Senate claims the same privilege, and in every legislative bill in the past where there has been any antagonism in the House, not to individual cases, but to a general increase on the part of the Senate, the House has finally yielded. I think it is better to adhere to the provisions of the bill without any change whatever.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, that explanation applies also, I suppose, to the proposed expenditures of $2,220 to a clerk to a so-called Committee of the Senate on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, after we have got this library building erected.

Mr. BINGHAM. We will look at that when we come to it.

Mr. QUIGG. We have reached it now.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think it is better to let the bill stand just as it is. This does not reach your amendment now.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment pending.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, on page 5, lines 4 and 5, I move to strike out the words "Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress."

Mr. Chairman, we have built this Library building. It is completed; we have removed our books to it; the work is done. There is no longer any occasion for this committee of the Senate to employ a clerk at $2,200. The fact is, there is no occasion for the committee to exist, although it is not our business; but when it comes to paying the money, it is somewhat our business. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether any reason in public policy exists for this expenditure? If there is any reason, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will simply answer the gentleman to this effect, that among the standing committees of the Senate is a committee so indicated, as well as another committee called the Joint Committee on the Library. They have in the Senate at the present time a Census Committee, although no census is being taken, although a law will perhaps be enacted in this Congress providing for the taking of the census of 1900. I will say to the gentleman that, while there is great force in his statement, these committees of the Senate exist. We have accepted the recommendations of the Senate, delighted that they gave us no increases. What they will do later on we can not say; but if the gentleman desires to persist in his motion, as it is in the line of economy, if we do not recognize that courtesy which both Houses have always declared they would maintain and which Congress has always maintained, I have no objection. But I will state if we strike it out here they will put it in the bill in the Senate.

Mr. QUIGG. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, let us strike it out. There is a committee of the Senate known as the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the joint committee.

Mr. QUIGG (continuing). Which acts with our committee as a joint committee, and to that committee all matters pertaining to the affairs of the Library are referred. There is no occasion in the Senate for the existence of this committee known as "Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress," and I say it exists solely for the purpose of taking out of the Treasury this $2,220.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well, then; I will say that, throwing courtesy between the two Houses to the winds, I will accept the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be adopted. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under Architect of the Capitol: For chief engineer, $1,700; two assistant engineers, at $1,200 each; four conductors of elevators, at $1,100 each, who shall be under the supervision and direction of the Architect of the Capitol; laborer, $820; five firemen, at $900 each; electrician, $1,200; laborer, $1,000; laborer to clean Statuary Hall and watch statuary therein, $660; in all, $16,680.

Mr. MOODY. I move to strike out the last word; and I do so for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to some comparisons of appropriations which are made in this bill. By this paragraph which has just been concluded we appropriate for the chief engineer upon the northern side of the Capitol $2,160, and we appropriate, on page 12 of this bill, for the chief engineer upon this side of the Capitol $1,700—a very considerable difference.

I desire also to call the attention of members of the committee to the fact that it costs $1,200 to run an elevator in the Capitol under one system of appointment, and if gentlemen will observe page 27 of this bill, it costs $720 to have the same service performed a mile and a quarter away, in the Treasury building, and all other Departments; that it costs $1,095 to employ a fireman in this building, and $720 and $660 respectively to employ firemen in the Treasury building. I desire to make no comment upon this, because I have no objection to make at this time. I simply desire to call the attention of the committee to these facts. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, on pages 60 and 61 of the bill there are two or three paragraphs in relation to the Territory of Arizona, and I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] if he will not consent to pass over those paragraphs temporarily, if they are reached this afternoon, as I shall be necessarily absent from the House by reason of an engagement with one of the Department officials.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no objection to that.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Librarian of Congress, $5,000; chief assistant librarian, $4,000; assistant librarian (superintendent of reading room), $3,000; assistant, $1,800; two assistants, at $1,500 each; three assistants, at $1,200 each; six assistants, at $900 each; ten attendants in collecting and distributing books, at $720 each; two attendants in Representatives' reading room, one at $900 and one at $720; attendant in Senators' reading room, $900; attendant in the Toner library, $900; attendant in the Washingtonian library, $900; two attendants in the cloakrooms, at $720 each; attendant in the stamping room, $720; attendant in the packing room, $720; two watchmen, at $720 each; chief of catalogue department, $3,000; two assistants, at $1,800 each; four assistants, at $1,500 each; four assistants, at $1,200 each; six assistants, at $900 each; superintendent of art gallery, $2,000; three assistants, at $900 each; superintendent of hall of maps and charts, $2,000; two assistants, at $900 each; superintendent of periodical department, $1,500; three attendants and collators, at $720 each; superintendent of manuscript department, $1,500; two assistants, indexing, at $720 each; superintendent of music department, $1,500; assistant, $900; two assistants, at $720 each; superintendent of Congressional reference library at Capitol, $1,500; two attendants, one at $900 and one at $720; superintendent of Law Library, $2,000; two assistants, at $1,400 each; and one laborer, $720; in all, $92,020.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, after line 15, page 20, at the end of the paragraph just read, I wish to offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

For additional expense involved in keeping the Library open daily from 9 a. m. to 10 p. m., $15,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the point of order lies against that amendment. If the Chair will examine the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to the Library of Congress, he will find the following:

The Joint Committee on the Library is authorized to establish regulations not inconsistent with law in relation to the Library of Congress, or either department thereof, and from time to time to alter, amend, or repeal the same; but such regulations as to the Law Library shall be subject to those imposed by the justices of the Supreme Court, etc.

That is the law. Operating under that law, the hours fixed for the opening of the Library have been determined. They are determined by the action of the joint committee. Therefore, as against this amendment, I make the point of order that it is inconsistent with existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Delaware desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HANDY. I do. Under the statute read by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Joint Committee on Library is given authority to make regulations for the opening and the closing of the Library each day. The amendment which I have proposed does not at all interfere with the power of the joint committee in that respect; does not alter their power in any way. It simply makes an appropriation to enable them to extend the hours of keeping the Library open, so that the hours may be from 9 a. m. to 10 p. m., if the committee desire to do so. Therefore I can not see that this amendment makes any alteration in existing law. It simply makes an appropriation in furtherance of an object already authorized by law and already in part provided for by law, and I submit that the point of order does not hold against such an amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the gentleman must show the law authorizing the extension which he proposes. I have shown the law which makes the existing condition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture, including partitions and screens, $20,000.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, after the paragraph just read, on page 22, I desire to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act the Library of Congress shall be known as and styled the "National Library;" and chapter 6 of Title II of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and all acts amendatory of or supplementary to the sections of chapter 6 of said Title II are hereby amended by striking therefrom, wherever they occur, the words "Library of Congress," or "Congressional Library" and substituting therefor the words "National Library."

The Librarian of Congress shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Director of the National Library," and as such and under such title shall have all the powers, be responsible under his bond, and perform all of the duties heretofore imposed on and required by law of the Librarian of Congress.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the point of order on that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill that the word "Congressional" ought to follow the word "national."

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Tennessee has made a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Tennessee has simply reserved the point of order, and I should like to make a few remarks upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee reserve the point of order?

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not desire to cut off the gentleman's statement, but the point of order that I desire to make and that I do make is that this changes existing law.

Mr. QUIGG. I trust the gentleman will withhold the point until I can make a brief statement.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will do so.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, this amendment embodies the substance of a bill that has been presented to the House by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] a member of the subcommittee in charge of this appropriation bill. The bill introduced by the gentleman from Missouri came in due course to the Committee on the Library and has received the unanimous indorsement of that committee and a favorable report to the House. The reasons why the committee believes that this is good legislation are briefly stated. Of course, the object of the amendment is obvious. It simply changes the name of the library from the "Library of Congress," or the "Congressional Library," as it has been termed in past acts, to the "National Library," and it changes the title of the official in charge of the library from "Librarian" to "Director of the Library."

It has no other effect whatever. It in no respect changes the legal relation of Congress to the Library, but simply, by a change in nomenclature, takes notice of the fact that this great institution has long since ceased to be merely an adjunct of Congress and a tool for the use of members of Congress in the discharge of their public duties, and has now become a great consulting and reference library for the people of the whole country.

It has been the policy of the Committee on the Library ever since I have been a member of it, and I think for years before, to endeavor by all means in our power to interest the people in this great educational institution, and it has been hoped that, as a result of the erection of the great new Library building, the interest of individuals all over the country will be so excited that in the future art treasures of the highest value, which no money can buy, will be deposited in this Library building as the property of the people of the United States; and it is believed that this change in the name of the Library, recognizing the more intimate relation of the people to its contents, will have excellent results, first in stimulating interest in the work of the Library, and then in assisting it in the furtherance of its work.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order will not be insisted upon. The amendment, I am sure, will have the approval of the Senate Committee on the Library, members of which I have already consulted, and I am certain that it will become a law unless this point of order shall be maintained against it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the gentleman's amendment propose to give to the people resident here in the District of Columbia, and also to those who are temporarily here, the right to the use of the Library?

Mr. QUIGG. A bill to that effect has been prepared and will undoubtedly receive the support of the committee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But that is not in your amendment.

Mr. QUIGG. No. To answer the gentleman frankly, I was afraid to put it in, because that is legislation of a more drastic character.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think it ought to be in.

Mr. QUIGG. I think it ought to pass.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not wish to detain the committee but a few moments. I concede that the point of order submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee is well taken. The only object I had in introducing the bill which has been reported by the Committee on the Library was to conform the name of this library to facts. This library is not a Congressional library. It is located in the most magnificent library building in the world. It does not belong to Congress.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The "Congressional library" is up there [pointing].

Mr. DOCKERY. As suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS], the Congressional library is in the hall in the rear—the House library—and the Senate library is at the other end of the Capitol; but the library of which we are now speaking is not a Congressional library. Congress does not own it. It belongs to the Nation, to the Republic, and you may spell "Nation," if you prefer, with two big "N's." The title "National" would indicate what the building is. It fitly illustrates the progress and the power of the Republic. That library is not, as I have stated, the peculiar property of the Senate and the House. The President has an interest there. Seventy million people should have the right to enter there——

Mr. PEARSON. Day and night.

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes, and every citizen of this great capital and great country should have access to library privileges. But that is not the issue raised at this time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. My colleague on the committee will allow me to ask him whether there is not in every single Department of the Government here in Washington a library independent of this Congressional Library?

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes, sir; I regret to say there is.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then, if you propose to make this a national library, why do you not go further and collect in that library all these independent libraries in the various Departments?

Mr. DOCKERY. I heartily indorse the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia, and will cooperate with him in any efforts in that direction.

Mr. QUIGG. That will undoubtedly be done.

Mr. DOCKERY. I shall be found working hand in hand with gentlemen in the line of that suggestion.

We have about 851,000 volumes in these different departmental libraries. Some of those books are technical, and of course properly belong to those Departments, being essential to the proper conduct of the public business. But the books in those libraries which are of a general or miscellaneous character should be transferred to the National Library.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not understand that there are enough of those books to amount to anything.

Mr. DOCKERY. There are about 851,000 volumes in the libraries of the Departments—more than there are in the Congressional Library itself.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does my colleague [Mr. DOCKERY] undertake to say that these Departments have libraries of miscellaneous books?

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then every one of those volumes ought to be over here in the Congressional Library.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly; my colleague is right in that statement. The Treasury Department has a circulating library; the Interior Department, I am informed, has also a circulating library, and perhaps the same is true of one or two other Departments.

A MEMBER. The War Department also.

Another MEMBER. And the Bureau of Education.

Mr. DOCKERY. The reform now suggested is not covered by the amendment of the gentleman from New York; but I believe the Committee on the Library will take up this question and report a bill in harmony with the recent recommendation submitted to Congress by Librarian Young. That goes, of course, further than the amendment pending. But I do earnestly desire that the great Library, which is to be greater still when we call from the Departments books which properly belong yonder in our great Library building—I do desire that Library to be known as a national library. It properly symbolizes the glory of the Republic, and, in my judgment, should be recognized by name as the property of the nation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. I confess I am very greatly astonished at his declaration that there are 851,000 volumes in the libraries of the different Departments. Unless the gentleman has some evidence of that——

Mr. QUIGG. He is quite right.

Mr. DOCKERY. You will find the statement in the report of Librarian Young, just submitted to Congress.

Mr. QUIGG. And you will find it in the testimony taken by the Committee on the Library a year ago. We went into all these Departments and made an examination. We ascertained exactly how many volumes each Department had. Circulating libraries are maintained in these Departments, consisting of all sorts of books—novels, books of history, books of biography, etc. Books of this description are bought from year to year by the Departments and are circulated among the people of this District.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Where do the Departments get the money to buy them?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Exactly. I was about to ask how can they get money for that purpose unless it is appropriated by Congress?

Mr. BINGHAM. If I can be allowed a statement, I think I can make the matter clear.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not see how such purchases can be authorized unless the Appropriations Committee report appropriations for that purpose.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thought the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] had the floor.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to conclude my statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. McMILLIN. I believe the question under discussion was the point of order. I do not desire, however, to cut off any debate in which these gentlemen may desire to indulge.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Tennessee reserved his point of order, in deference to the request of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] proceed

The CHAIRMAN. The point is made by the gentleman from Tennessee that debate is not in order.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no objection to the debate continuing.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have the floor, and I should like to answer the question put by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The question which I wished to ask my friend from Missouri is this: How is it possible that any of these eight great Executive Departments can buy books, such as novels, etc., unless the committee presided over by my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is a member, provides for placing money in the hands of those Departments for that purpose and gives these Cabinet officers the discretion to buy novels, etc.? If this thing has been done, I want to know something about it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will make this statement to the gentleman from Tennessee in response to what he has said. We have already passed an amendment, without comment or criticism, to the bill which refers to the point the gentleman has been submitting. This is the amendment proposed and which has passed the scrutiny of the committee:

That hereafter law books, books of reference, and periodicals for the use of any Executive Department, or other Government establishment not under an Executive Department, at the seat of Government, shall not be purchased or paid for from any appropriation made for contingent expenses or for any specific or general purpose unless such purchase is authorized and payment therefor specifically provided in the law granting the appropriation.

Now, we have discovered, in connection with the purchase of books and periodicals by the various Departments, that they have used the contingent and miscellaneous funds—even in the appropriation for the new war ships—wherever it has been practicable to do so, for the purchase of such books and periodicals. They have been using large sums, generally appropriated, for the aforesaid specific purpose. We feel that we have made a limitation, and a proper limitation, upon that action hereafter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Have they been doing it with the consent of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BINGHAM. Why, we have just discovered it, and we are now endeavoring to correct it. We believe the amendment will correct it.

In the appropriations covering the purchase of books, periodicals, and so on specifically, when we come to the paragraphs of the bill covering the expenditures in that regard for any Department we mention "books and periodicals," in compliance with the limitation of appropriation already made in the bill, so that hereafter the appropriations for this purpose could not be diverted; and also of the appropriations for the current year we cut down almost $10,000 and have given it to the Library of Congress for an increase in appropriations for the purchase of books for that establishment.

Now, this matter will doubtless be taken up and considered by the Committee on the Library——

Mr. QUIGG. It will.

Mr. BINGHAM (continuing). And ultimately the transfer of the books and periodicals from the twenty-one different departmental libraries in Washington will undoubtedly be made to the Library of Congress.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to let the general debate upon this proposition produce a misapprehension as to what the amendment here is, and I will make a statement concerning my point of order. It is that it changes existing law.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], my friend, has inveighed against the abuses to which he has referred here. This does not propose to remedy those abuses. The amendment does not propose to do anything of that kind. If there have been books bought by the Department heretofore without authority at all, and the practice has gone on for years allowing the purchase and the holding of circulating libraries in the Departments, it has been done out of appropriations made by this Congress. It could not possibly have occurred in any other way.

Not only that, but this is not the first time this abuse has been called to the attention of the House. It has been debated heretofore and the facts have been laid before Congress.

Now, I am in sympathy, very much, with the proposition to bring in all of the libraries in the Departments and have all these books and periodicals deposited in one place. I may sympathize very much with the proposition to give the utmost advantage and the greatest liberality to the public in the use of that great Library.

But that is not at all the question presented. The eulogy of the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] is no panegyric on the Library. It deserves it in all respects. It was built under the name of the Congressional Library; it has existed under that name, and it has attained its greatness and magnificence as the Congressional Library, and while Shakespeare says that "there is nothing in a name, and that which we call a rose by any other name would smell as sweet," I do not suppose that to retain the old name would detract in the least from the magnificence, utility, and the character of that splendid building. My proposition does not cut off anything that has been proposed in that regard.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] says that he is willing, entirely, to take some more big "N's" in his, and he wants the National Library to be spelled with a capital "N" just as the Nation is spelled with a capital "N." But, so far as I am concerned, I prefer the old name, and if there is to be a change at all, then let it be done in some more regular way than this.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, a single word more and then the Chair can rule.

I introduced the bill when the Committee on the Library was considering the question of changing the name of the Library. The matter of the abuse, in respect to the purchase of books, came to my attention after I introduced the bill. The majority of the Library Committee are now present; and I assume, in the light of developments of this discussion, that they will take up the question at once and report a bill.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, in connection with what has been said about the libraries in the various Departments, I wish to call attention to the fact that under existing regulations, when those books now in the Departments shall be gathered into this great Congressional Library, they will be put in a place where the thousands of employees of the Government of the United States working in this city can not possibly get at them. There are 17,000 men and women employed in the Departments in Washington who have a taste for books. Many of these people are scholarly in their habits and tastes.

At the very hour when they must go to work in the Departments the Congressional Library opens. The hour when they are relieved from their work in the Departments is the hour when the Congressional Library closes. As a result, this great and beautiful Library of ours over here is a place where books are entombed and shut up, away from the great army of men in Washington who would like to read them and who are competent to profit by their use.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HANDY. Happily.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you not know that the Librarian of Congress, or whatever his proper title is, has a recommendation pending to keep this Congressional Library open at night?

Mr. HANDY. I am well aware of that fact, Mr. Chairman, and just a moment ago I offered an amendment to this bill to carry that recommendation into effect.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, that is right.

Mr. HANDY. And my amendment fell before the point of order of the gentleman having the bill in charge. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that if an amendment proposing to open this Library so that the people of Washington and the people in the Departments can have access to it must fall before a point of order, then surely it is quite proper that this amendment simply to change the name of the Library should fall. I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will see his way clear to let us postpone this section of the bill until the close of the civil-service debate, and let us see if we can not in the meantime, during the intervening holiday recess, make some arrangement by which this great Library may be thrown open to the people of Washington and to the men and women employed in the Departments.

Mr. CUMMINGS and Mr. QUIGG addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. QUIGG. It is the purpose of the Committee on the Library to present to the House——

Mr. CUMMINGS. I should like to ask, Mr. Chairman, how many gentlemen there are from New York?

A MEMBER. Thirty-four.

Mr. CUMMINGS. One of them seems to be doing all the talking.

Mr. QUIGG. I shall be very happy to yield to my colleague. I would not take him from his feet. He can take my place.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the Naval Committee, I want to deny that appropriations for books are ever made under the guise of appropriations for war ships. The appropriations are specified in every bureau, and books are included. The Naval Committee knows what it is about when it is proposing appropriations for books.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would simply state to the gentleman, as he is on the Committee on Naval Affairs, that there have been purchases of books from the general appropriation for the increase of the Navy. That does go to the contingent fund of the Department beyond question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My friend from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] undertakes to speak for the Naval Committee. The surprising thing to me is that there should be more than 100,000 volumes, on an average, to each of the eight Departments of this Government—that 850,000 volumes should be found in the various Departments. That makes a larger collection of books than we have in the Congressional Library. I think there are only about 740,000 or 750,000 volumes in that Library.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield the floor. I have a copy of a report that I want to examine.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you not remember that in the closing days of the Fifty-third Congress there was a prolonged debate here once about establishing a city library, and gathering all these books into it?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And it was stated then that that collection of books would be nearly as large as the collection in the Congressional Library.

Mr. QUIGG. Now, Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the Chair and of my gracious colleague from New York——

Mr. CUMMINGS. You are three times ahead of me already.

Mr. QUIGG. I should like to say that it is the purpose of the Committee on the Library, if I understand my colleagues, to present to Congress a bill covering most of the points that have been raised in this debate.

Just exactly what the bill will provide I should not like to undertake to say now. But undoubtedly some effort will be made to gather together these departmental collections, and also some effort made to open the Library for the people of the District. These two provisions will certainly be in the bill in some form or another. I had hoped, since it is so difficult to obtain any legislation in the House except on an appropriation bill, that we might have gone a little way in this reform through the adoption of the measure of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will say to the gentleman that the way to get it through is through the Committee on Rules; that is the only way I know of. [Laughter.]

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HEPBURN). There is a point of order pending.

Mr. McMILLIN. I reserve the point of order, if the gentleman desires to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is reserved.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, as the report of the Librarian of Congress is not yet in printed form, so that the members can get at it, I take the floor and ask that the Clerk read from the desk, in order that it may go into the RECORD, what the Librarian has to say in his official report in regard to opening the Library at night. I ask the Clerk to read that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

OPENING AT NIGHT.

The question of opening the Library at night to the general public can not be urged with too much emphasis. The report of the Joint Committee on the Library, made by Senator HANSBROUGH, March 3, 1897, was expressed in its advocacy:

"Your Joint Committee on the Library," says the report, "would suggest the advisability of such appropriations as may be necessary for the employment of an additional force, in order that the Library may be opened at night for the general public."

The opening of the Library at night should be deemed a right rather than a privilege. While the books were in the Capitol there were valid reasons to the contrary. The ever-present danger of fire, the limited accommodations arising out of the congested conditions of the Library, and which made general reading inconvenient and in various sections of research impossible, all combined to make night opening unwise.

Conditions peculiar to Washington life suggest night opening as advisable. Here dwell thousands of persons in the public service, whose hours of labor are, as a rule, from 9 to 4. At 4 o'clock, the Library, unless Congress is in session, is closed. Of this number, there are many who would welcome the Library for purposes of study and amusement. It is denied to them, and during their leisure hours they are thrown upon social and domestic resources. Not only is the Library closed for reading, but, likewise, as a splendid public building, with all the beauty and splendor of its decorations, and as such worthy of study. We are free from the conditions which make night opening inconvenient.

Now, there is a building—none more suitable—for study at night. It is fireproof. There is a complete electric plant. Each reading table has its lights, while access to the shelves is as easy as during the day. Everything is so well arranged that the Library could be opened without delay.

The annual expense is estimated at $15,000. The Librarian has asked for this sum, with permission to open the Library at once. The hours for reading would be from 9 in the morning until 10 in the evening, the reading room alone available at night.

The force of reading-room attendants could be divided into two sections, one on duty from 9 to 4, and the other from 4 to 10. The estimate of $15,000 is necessarily based upon probable wants. If too large, that could be ascertained during the processes of administration, and acted upon accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman simply asks that that matter be made a part of the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Executive Office, including stationery therefor, as well as record books, telegrams, books for library, miscellaneous items, and furniture and carpets for office, care of office carriage, horses, and harness, $9,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, we have reached the paragraph concerning the Civil Service Commission. An order of the House has been made that we pass this paragraph covering the Civil Service Commission without prejudice until we reach the close of the bill, and that an agreement be then made as to debate, if possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will observe the order of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter the Secretary of State shall cause to be delivered to the Superintendent of Documents the Revised Statutes, supplements thereto, session laws, and Statutes at Large, to supply deficiencies, and to be sold by him under the provisions of section 61 of the act approved January 12, 1895, entitled "An act providing for the public printing and binding and distribution of public documents."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], heretofore chairman of the Committee on Printing, and familiar with what is known as his law, to the foot of page 25 of the bill, if the Clerk will read it. This is an amendment and new law.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Page 25 of this bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. On page 25:

Hereafter the Secretary of State shall cause to be delivered to the Superintendent of Documents the Revised Statutes, supplements thereto, session laws, and Statutes at Large, to supply deficiencies, and to be sold by him under the provisions of section 61 of the act approved January 12, 1895, entitled "An act providing for the public printing and binding and distribution of public documents."

This is new legislation. While the gentleman is reading, I would state to the House that it is the recommendation of the Secretary of State. Under what is known as the printing law all publications are sold under the provisions of section 61 of the act approved January 12, 1895. This transfers the sale of the Statutes at Large from the Department of State to the Superintendent of Documents, so that he shall have control of the sale of the Statutes at Large also. The State Department does not desire to continue to control their sale.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think that is all right.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of customs: For chief of division, $2,750; assistant chief of division, $2,000; three clerks of class 4; additional to one clerk of class 4 acting as drawback clerk, $200; three clerks of class 3; two clerks of class 2; two clerks of class 1; two clerks, at $1,000 each; three clerks, at $900 each; and two assistant messengers; in all, $26,490.

Division of appointments: For chief of division, $2,750; assistant chief of division, $2,000; two clerks of class 4; three clerks of class 3; three clerks of class 2; five clerks of class 1; four clerks at $1,000 each; six clerks at $900 each; one messenger; three assistant messengers; and one laborer; in all, $36,410.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I submit the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 29, after line 2, insert the following:

"Hereafter collectors of customs and their special deputies shall be competent to administer oaths to officers of the Revenue-Marine service and employees of the customs service required by sections 1790 and 2693 of the Revised Statutes."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, collectors of customs and their deputies are now authorized to administer oaths to officials of the Revenue-Marine Service. The subordinate, or rather the inspector, force of customs each month have to take oath before a notary that they are in no wise interested in importations before they can receive their monthly pay. As the law now is, it requires them to go before a notary and pay the notary fee each month. This has operated as a hardship.

The collector and deputy collector are now authorized to administer oaths to the Revenue-Marine Service, and this simply allows the customs subordinates the privilege of administering the oath to the inspector force, and prevents the necessity of their going outside each month and paying a fee of 25 and sometimes 50 cents.

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to have printed in the RECORD Secretary Gage's letter.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 13, 1897.

SIR: Referring to the letter of Mr. A. K. McClure, of Philadelphia, with copy of Circular No. 44 of 1893, of this Department, providing that collectors of customs or their special deputies shall be competent to administer oaths to officers of the Revenue-Marine Service, required in sections 1790 and 2693, Revised Statutes, with an amendment to include employees in the customs service, transmitted to this Department by you under date of December 4, 1897, and to your request for judgment if it would be advisable to amend the statutes in question as suggested, you are informed that in the opinion of the Department it would greatly facilitate the conduct of official business under the statutes referred to if so amended.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

Hon. HENRY H. BINGHAM,
Chairman Subcommittee in Charge of Legislative, etc., Bill,
House of Representatives.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Comptroller of the Treasury: For Comptroller of the Treasury, $5,500; Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury, $4,500; chief clerk, $2,500; chief law clerk, $2,500; four law clerks revising accounts and briefing opinions, one at $2,100 and three at $2,000 each; three clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; two clerks of class 1; two messengers; and one assistant messenger; in all, $39,700.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 33, after line 2, insert:
"That hereafter the salary of the Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury shall be $4,500."

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that that is subject to a point of order.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is, and reduces the salary from $5,000 to $4,500.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will not insist on my point of order.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Treasurer: For Treasurer of the United States, $6,000; assistant treasurer, $3,600; cashier, $3,600; assistant cashier, $3,300; chief clerk, $2,500; five chiefs of division, at $2,500 each; vault clerk, $2,500; principal bookkeeper, $2,500; assistant bookkeeper, $2,100; two tellers, at $2,500 each; two assistant tellers, at $2,250 each; clerk for the Treasurer, $1,800; twenty-five clerks of class 4; seventeen clerks of class 3; fourteen clerks of class 2; coin clerk, $1,400; twenty clerks of class 1; nine clerks, at $1,000 each; forty-seven clerks, at $900 each; nineteen expert counters, at $720 each; nine clerks, at $700 each; mail messenger, $840; six messengers; six assistant messengers; twenty-three laborers; seven charwomen; three pressmen, at $1,200 each; eight separators, at $660 each; seven feeders, at $660 each; one compositor and pressman, at $3.20 per day; in all, $279,841.60.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of the paragraph just read insert:
"That the appropriations for the salaries of the officials provided for in this bill shall not exceed three-fourths of the amounts mentioned in the bill so long as the gold standard is maintained in the United States."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman desires to be heard upon that amendment, I reserve the point of order.

[Mr. WHEELER of Alabama addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of the attendance of the American member of the International Committee on Weights and Measures at the general conference provided for in the convention signed May 20, 1875, $475, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. BINGHAM. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 43, strike out lines 15, 16, and 17 and insert in lieu thereof the following:
"For expenses of the attendance of the American delegate at the meeting of the International Bureau of Weights and Measures as provided for in the convention."

Mr. BINGHAM. This is merely a change of the language of the paragraph, making it consistent with the language of the conference or bureau. We simply change the word "member" to the word "delegate," the words "Committee on Weights and Measures" to "Bureau of Weights and Measures," and "general conference" to "meeting."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows, under the heading "Office of assistant treasurer at New York:"

Chief detective, $1,500; assistant detective, $1,200; two engineers, at $1,050 each; assistant engineer, $820; six watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $195,640.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend by inserting in line 10, page 53, the word "eight" instead of "five;" so as to make the salary of the chief detective $1,800.

Mr. BINGHAM. I reserve all points of order on this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I doubt whether a point of order lies against the amendment, because it does not propose to create a new office, but simply to change the salary provided for this official. This office has existed in the treasury department at New York for a great many years; and until 1895 the salary was always $1,800. In that year, although the Treasury Department, in the estimates, recommended a continuance of the salary at that figure, the Committee on Appropriations, for some reasons which I do not know, reported an appropriation of $1,500 instead of $1,800; and the salary has continued at $1,500 from that time till the present.

The duties of this official are constant and onerous. He has but six days' vacation in the entire year. He is required to be on duty for, I believe, ten hours every day, thus serving more hours daily than the ordinary officials in that building. He must be a man of aptitude in the detection of all sorts of misdemeanors and crimes. He must be able to judge of the character of persons coming into the building. In fact, he must be constantly on the alert to guard the interests of the United States in that building.

I know that the present incumbent of this office is a man of special fitness for the position and is especially industrious. I sincerely believe that the compensation formerly paid, $1,800, is none too much for a competent man, such as the present incumbent is.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] has stated that this officer's tour of duty extends over ten hours. Why? I presume the hours in the assistant treasurer's office at New York correspond to ordinary banking hours and extend from 10 in the morning till 3 in the afternoon.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not for this man. He is on duty from 8 o'clock in the morning until 5 in the afternoon.

Mr. BINGHAM. I know nothing about this particular officer's tour of duty, but as he is employed in the assistant treasurer's office, as indicated in the bill, I assume that his tour of duty would practically correspond with banking hours—that he would be engaged only from 10 till 3.

Mr. SHERMAN. In fact, he is engaged much longer.

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish to state to the gentleman that throughout this bill there has not been in any paragraph an increase of compensation for any subordinates beyond that paid during the current year except in a single case, where there had been a reduction of pay by reason of a perversion of the former law, and where, therefore, we reported an appropriation which would allow this subordinate the salary which he had received in the past before the law had been perverted.

We followed in this allowance the current law of 1895, or since 1895, allowing $1,500 per annum for this salary. In 1895 the United States treasurer at the city of New York, as I understand it, was the same officer who discharges the same duties now. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I think you are.

Mr. BINGHAM. That being so, the treasurer made the recommendation of the change which the Committee on Appropriations has accepted. The estimates were submitted as follows:

Independent Treasurer's Office, assistant treasurer of New York: Minor coin teller, $2,100—

An increase of $100 on the former appropriation—chief detective, from $1,800 to $1,500; assistant detective, $1,400 to $1,200.

The official in charge being the same then as to-day, the Committee on Appropriations accepted from the Secretary his recommendation, and we have therefore continued the current law.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I received my information with reference to the estimates from the Appropriations Committee room this morning, and was told by the clerk that the estimate in 1895, when the change was made, is the same that it had been prior to that time, namely, $1,800.

Mr. BINGHAM. The assistant treasurer came before us and had a hearing.

Mr. SHERMAN. My information came from the Committee on Appropriations this morning and did not disclose that fact.

Mr. BINGHAM. I was not in conversation with the gentleman——

Mr. SHERMAN. I was in conversation with the clerk of the committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. And if the gentleman will turn to page 547 of the estimate, the statements of new officers, etc., a compilation running from 1889 to 1896, he will find that I have stated accurately the estimate made in this particular case.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not find that information in the committee room this morning. But, however that may be, I think the compensation of $1,800 is not more than it ought to be for the services rendered; and that amount was paid prior to 1895.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have only to repeat that the official in charge of the treasury department at New York is the same to-day as he was then, and having made the recommendation of this reduction in 1895, and making no other recommendation to the committee at the present time, it seems that the gentleman, having made his statement, would be satisfied to let the matter rest as it is.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to read in that connection a brief extract from the President's message.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania make the point of order; and if so, will he state what it is?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that this is contrary to existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the existing law?

Mr. BINGHAM. One thousand five hundred dollars a year.

Mr. SHERMAN. The existing law is for a detective at New York.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, at a salary of $1,500 per annum.

Mr. SHERMAN. The existing law, Mr. Chairman, is for a chief detective at New York, without reference to salary.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state to the gentleman that the creation of the office is by appropriation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then originally it was created at $1,800.

Mr. BINGHAM. That I do not know.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was prior to 1895. Since 1895 the salary has been reduced to $1,500, but before that date $1,800 was paid, and my amendment simply changes the compensation allowed for the official to what it was before this change was made in 1895.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask a ruling on the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the statement of the gentleman from New York, the Chair is inclined to overrule the point of order. Unless the appropriation bill should provide that hereafter the salary is to be $1,500, there would be no violation of existing law in increasing it from $1,500 to $1,800.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask a vote on the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. Before that is done, I wish to state that I hope we will not enter upon a system of increasing compensation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold the ruling in abeyance if the gentleman in charge of the bill desires it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I did not understand the gentleman in charge of the bill objected to the ruling. However, I desire to call the attention of the House, and especially the Republican side of it, to the suggestion contained in the closing paragraph of the President's message, in the following words:

> The estimates of the expenses of the Government by the several Departments will, I am sure, have your careful scrutiny. While the Congress may not find it an easy task to reduce the expenses of the Government, it should not encourage their increase. These expenses will, in my judgment, admit of a decrease in many branches of the Government without injury to the public service. It is a commanding duty to keep the appropriations within the receipts of the Government, and thus avoid a deficit.

Since the beginning of the present fiscal year the Treasury deficiency amounts to about $47,000,000. I assume that this deficiency is the basis of the recommendation to hold matters in statu quo at least until the Government reaches a point where income will balance expenditures.

Mr. BINGHAM. Do I understand that the Chair has made a ruling which admits of this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the inclination of the Chair, unless the gentleman in charge of the bill can show the Chair that the amendment is in violation of existing law. The Chair bases its ruling on the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SHERMAN. That the salary was $1,800 prior to 1895.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am disposed to think, Mr. Chairman, as a general proposition, that it becomes the duty of the gentleman offering an amendment to show that he stands upon statute law. That is his function. He must show how he stands and where he stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I assume that the gentleman raising a point of order must sustain himself upon that point of order. But the gentleman and I will not disagree as to what the facts are.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am perfectly willing to let the matter go to the committee under the ruling of the Chair, although I do not approve of that ruling.

I desire to make the statement that $1,500 is the current law, the amount paid during this year, recommended in the bill for the next fiscal year, the same as for the present current year. I wish to say that in this great bill we have made but one recommendation of increase of compensation of any subordinate of the Government; further, that the gentleman in charge of the office at New York, the assistant treasurer, is the same gentleman who had charge of it two years ago, and your committee have no recommendation from him. Upon that statement I am perfectly willing to submit the matter to the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. Do I understand the gentleman to state that this proposition to increase comes notwithstanding there is a failure to submit an estimate—that there is, in fact, no estimate for the increase?

Mr. BINGHAM. None whatever.

Mr. DOCKERY. Nobody asks for it officially.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I do. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we are prepared to vote on this until some one on the Democratic side has read that famous paragraph of the President's message. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SHERMAN) there were—ayes 13, noes 81.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

United States mints and assay offices.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] asked me to request, when we reached the paragraph relating to United States mints and assay offices, the mint at Carson City, Nev., having been eliminated, that he may be privileged to-morrow, or at the close of the consideration of the bill, to recur to that paragraph to offer an amendment. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that that be allowed.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless there be objection, consent will be considered as granted.

There was no objection.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

> Territory of Arizona: For governor, $2,600; chief justice and three associate judges, at $3,000 each; secretary, $1,800; interpreter and translator in the executive office, $500; in all, $16,900.
> For contingent expenses of the Territory, to be expended by the governor, $500.
> For legislative expenses, namely: For rent, messenger, postage, stationery, fuel, lights, printing, and incidental expenses for secretary's office; per diem of members of the legislature, mileage, legislative supplies, pay of officers of legislature, rent, furniture, printing, and incidentals for legislative assembly, $24,250.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, the Delegate from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] has been called out. He has asked that the paragraph just read be passed without prejudice until his return. I therefore make that request.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be so ordered, without objection.

There was no objection.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

STATE, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

> Office of the superintendent: For one clerk of class 1; chief engineer, $1,200; eight assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; captain of the watch, $1,200; two lieutenants of the watch, at $840 each; fifty-eight watchmen; carpenter, $1,000; plumber, $900; machinist and painter, at $900 each; four skilled laborers, at $720 each; twenty-eight firemen; ten conductors of elevators, at $720 each; seventeen laborers; and eighty charwomen; in all, $119,400.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, to strike out the words "fifty-eight," in the fifteenth and sixteenth lines of page 69 of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the word "forty;" making it read "forty watchmen," instead of "fifty-eight watchmen."

Mr. Chairman, in examining this bill I find that fifty-eight watchmen, two lieutenants, and a captain are provided to watch one public building, the State, War, and Navy building in this city. Under the ordinary rules prevailing in municipal governments, one police officer is supposed to be about sufficient for every 1,000 of the population. Yet in this bill we provide for fifty-eight policemen, two lieutenants, and a captain to watch and guard one public building, a force sufficient to protect a city of 60,000 inhabitants. I do not believe there is a city of 60,000 population in the United States that has a greater police force.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, it is entirely excessive, and when we look at the character of the building they are supposed to watch the appropriation seems to be still more enormous. The building is absolutely fireproof. It needs no watching, so far as fire is concerned. You could not set it on fire if you wanted to. If one room were to burn, fire would not extend to the next. We find, further, that it contains nothing ordinarily of commercial value.

It does not contain a single document that any thief would want to steal. It does not contain a document that any thief would pick up in the big road if he found it. Now, what is the necessity of maintaining a force of 58 watchmen, 2 lieutenants, and 1 captain to watch and guard a building absolutely fireproof, and which does not contain anything but treaties, records, and contracts which the Government has made and caused to be printed, and which are of no commercial value whatever? I have inquired as to whether these men do any other duty——

Mr. GAINES. What page is that on?

Mr. SHAFROTH. On page 69, line 15.

I have asked whether these men perform any other duty than that of watchmen. I thought perhaps they were also engaged as messengers; but I find that they are not; that that is no part of their duty. I find that in this bill there are numbers and numbers of messengers who are provided for the officers who occupy the State, War, and Navy building. The purpose of this force, as I understand it, is simply to watch this building, and to stand at the entrances, the main entrances of the building on the main floor, and answer questions that are asked. There are usually two of them at each entrance. Why they need more than one I can not conceive. Each is supposed to know the same thing as to the location of the various rooms. When you take into consideration the fact that this is simply one building, without any grounds, and is absolutely fireproof, it seems to me that this force could be cut down to ten instead of the number named in the amendment I have offered.

We have a capitol building in Denver, in my State, about half as large as this building. We have there a night watchman and a day watchman—simply two. The number has proven amply sufficient. Why it is that 58 watchmen, 2 lieutenants, and 1 captain should be required for the purpose of guarding the State, War, and Navy building is a mystery to me. I therefore move the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I would simply say to the gentleman, and for the information of the committee, that the current law allows 58 subordinate force to the State, War, and Navy building. That was the force allowed as soon as the building was completed. When the building was completed, a most careful and thorough examination was made into the subject, and the Committee on Appropriations, recognizing the necessity of economy, and at the same time recognizing the necessity for an adequate force, provided this number.

This bill was then in charge of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and he made an investigation in order to determine what should be the force; and that number has been recognized from that day to this. Your committee is in continual opposition to the Treasury Department, as well as the Departments of State, War, and Navy, in making applications and appealing to the committee for an increase of this force.

Now the force is on duty twenty-four hours. There are three tours of duty, the law allowing but eight hours' duty. Therefore in each tour of duty there are about twenty men. The Treasury Department has the same subordinate force as that which is allowed to the State, War, and Navy building; and the Treasury Department, in addition to the 58 general watchmen, has 6 special watchmen. These men are on duty inside and outside the building night and day on each tour. I am of the opinion, so far as my personal judgment goes, that this is not too large a force.

I merely desire to state for information of the House that the subject is one that received a careful investigation when the building was turned over for the use of the Government; that this number was then granted; that it has continued to this time; and while repeated applications have been made for an increase, we have always resisted it, but have made no reduction in the force. The gentleman should also understand these watchmen being on the regular force of the Department are entitled to thirty days' leave of absence for recreation, and also thirty days' sick leave under the law as it is and the additional thirty days under the provisions respecting contagious diseases in the family.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize the difficulty which the gentleman as chairman of the committee has to encounter in cutting down these appropriations. I recognize the fact that there is always pressure brought to bear upon the committee not only to maintain the force, but also to increase the force; but that would be the case if there were a thousand watchmen for that building.

But when we take into consideration that this building is situated in the heart of Washington City; situated where there is a large District police force that almost surrounds it and patrols the city—when you take into consideration that it does not contain anything that a burglar would ordinarily try to get, and the fact that it is absolutely fireproof, it seems to me that thirty men, on relays of eight hours, would be sufficient to guard that building. I think much less than that number even would be sufficient. Now, of course, this committee has inquired into this matter, and no doubt it is true that the Departments have endeavored to retain these men, and it is insisted that these men are necessary.

But how in the name of common sense is it necessary that there should be 58 policemen, 2 lieutenants, and a captain to guard that building, which is situated in the heart of a city that is itself well patrolled by police, a building, too, which contains nothing that would tempt a burglar to break into it?

A MEMBER. Is this provision according to the estimates?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know whether it is or not. In case of large and extensive new buildings, there is usually a large and liberal estimate made of the force required; but the present number seems to me to constitute entirely too large a force for this purpose. I think it must be obvious from the facts I have stated that the public service can not be injured by the reduction I propose. As I have said, there are two men stationed at each door as you enter the building, and I can not understand why more than one is necessary. What those men do is to stand there and answer inquiries of persons who want to find different offices in different parts of the building. I do not see why one could not do that at each door just as well as two. On the whole, it is clear to me that forty men would answer all the purpose of an efficient patrolling of that building, and therefore I move this amendment be adopted.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SHAFROTH, the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 23.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Before we leave this paragraph I think we ought to reduce the total.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will say to the gentleman that at the close of the consideration of the bill we will ask consent to have all the totals corrected.

Mr. SHAFROTH. All right.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pension Office: For the Commissioner of Pensions, $5,000; First Deputy Commissioner, $3,600; Second Deputy Commissioner, $3,600; chief clerk, $2,250; assistant chief clerk, $2,000; medical referee, $3,000; assistant medical referee, $2,250; two qualified surgeons who shall be experts in their profession, at $2,000 each; eighty-eight medical examiners who shall be surgeons of education, skill, and experience in their profession, at $1,800 each; ten chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; law clerk, $2,000; fifty-eight principal examiners, at $2,000 each; twenty assistant chiefs of division, at $1,800 each; three stenographers, at $1,600 each; seventy clerks of class 4; eighty-five clerks of class 3; three hundred and fifty clerks of class 2; four hundred and thirty-eight clerks of class 1; two hundred and eighty-seven clerks, at $1,000 each; one hundred and seventy-five copyists; superintendent of building, $1,400; two engineers, at $1,200 each; three firemen; thirty-three messengers; twelve assistant messengers; twenty messenger boys, at $400 each; twenty-five laborers; five female laborers, at $400 each; fifteen charwomen; one painter skilled in his trade, $900; one cabinetmaker skilled in his trade, $900; captain of the watch, $840; three sergeants of the watch, at $750 each; twenty watchmen; in all, $2,086,710.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 85, strike out all of lines 10 to 24, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Three hundred and fifty clerks of class 2; four hundred clerks of class 1; two hundred and fifty clerks, at $1,000 each; one hundred and sixty copyists; superintendent of building, $1,400; two engineers, at $1,200 each; three firemen; thirty-three messengers; twelve assistant messengers; twenty messenger boys, at $400 each; thirty-five laborers; ten female laborers, at $400 each; fifteen charwomen; one painter, skilled in his trade, $900; one cabinetmaker, skilled in his trade, $900; captain of the watch, $840; three sergeants of the watch, at $750 each; twenty watchmen; in all, $1,971,210."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I submit that this amendment proposes a reduction in the clerical force in the Pension Office of $115,500, as well as a reduction of the force of ninety-five persons, consisting of twenty clerks of class 2, thirty-eight clerks of class 1, thirty-seven clerks at $1,000, and fifteen clerks at $900, with an allowance of ten laborers at $360 and five at $400. This reduction has been recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions, after examination.

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. With pleasure.

Mr. HANDY. Will the ninety-five clerks who are to be dispensed with under this amendment probably be Democrats? [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. The Commissioner says:

With this schedule I am confident that if the Commissioner of Pensions is permitted to reorganize this Bureau for the year 1899 untrammeled—

Which applies to that side of the House as well as to this—he can save this amount, and do so without interfering in any way with the efficiency of the service.

Mr. HANDY. That would indicate that he would get rid of clerks who are inefficient. Now, are all of the inefficient clerks there Democrats? [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I hardly think that question has been submitted anywhere in this debate. I do not know whether there are that many Democrats in that office or not. In fact, I know nothing about the political drift or proclivities of the subordinate force in the Bureau.

Mr. HANDY. It occurs to me that we might, by this kind of legislation, get rid of ninety-five Democrats now, and that a little later it might be found that the force was too meager, and then the Commissioner might take on, to take their places, ninety-five clerks who would not be Democrats. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I submit to the gentleman that these clerkships are all under the civil-service rules, and the Civil Service Commission to-day is the commission appointed by the last Administration.

Mr. HANDY. Yes; but I happen to know that the chiefs of divisions were also under civil service, and they were all promptly displaced when the present Administration came in.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would submit, Mr. Chairman, that the committee presents this proposition to the House in perfect good faith. The administration of the Pension Office belongs to the Commissioner of Pensions, and we simply submit this proposition in the line of economy, the Commissioner asking only that he may be untrammeled when reorganizing the Bureau on this basis, a request which, as I have already observed, applies to that side of the House as well as to this side.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, I was only hoping to get some statement from the gentleman that would perhaps cause the Commissioner to believe that this proposed reduction of the force ought not to be made altogether by displacing Democrats, so that this reduction might not be made a political matter.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, the remarks of the gentleman from Delaware will appear in the RECORD, and will, I trust, bear good fruit.

Mr. HANDY. But I should like to hear some remarks in the same line from the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have nothing to do with it beyond presenting my committee's report.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this is a proposition to reduce the force of the Pension Office ninety clerks?

Mr. BINGHAM. It proposes a reduction of ninety-five clerks, resulting in a reduction of $115,500 in the appropriation for the clerical force.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I listened very attentively to the debate on the pension bill. The appropriation for pensions is very large, showing little or no decrease in the number of applications, and that would seem to indicate the necessity for as large a force in the Pension Office as has been employed there heretofore, because it is understood that there are many applications which can not be attended to for want of sufficient force. But here is a proposition to reduce the force, which, I think, is not in the line of having liberal pension appropriations and attending to pension cases as promptly as possible.

Mr. BINGHAM. I can only say in answer to the gentleman that I think if he had charge of a bill of this description he would follow the same line of conduct that the Committee on Appropriations are pursuing in this case. If the head of a bureau, charged with the administration of that bureau and having under him a large subordinate force, running anywhere from 1,700 to 2,000, should come to Congress and officially state that a reduction of the force might be made to the extent indicated and without interfering in any way with the efficiency of the service, I believe my friend would accept and act upon such a recommendation.

We had the Commissioner under very careful examination; he took two or three days to reach this conclusion; and we desire to stand by that conclusion, as I think the gentleman from Kansas would do if he had charge of legislation under similar circumstances.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Of course, these questions are submitted to us for final verdict as to whether the propositions are right or wrong. In view of the fact that the business of the office is so far behind, in view of the fact that there is no decrease in the applications for pensions, and in view of other facts which have been brought before us in the discussion of the pension bill, it seems to me that in this recommendation the Commissioner is wrong.

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish to state to the gentleman one other fact. We have heretofore been giving half a million dollars for the per diem allowances of the detailed men of the Bureau doing work throughout the country. As a result of our examination, we have made a reduction of $100,000 in that item—a wise reduction, I think; and I believe this House so regards it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have heard what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] has said, and I approve it. I have also heard the statement of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON]. Now, I want to call the attention of the committee for a moment to the history of the increase of the force in the Pension Office, and also in the Records and Pension Division of the War Department. If I recollect aright, about the year 1883 business was greatly in arrears in both those offices. When a man's record was called for at the War Department by the Pension Office, it took from fifteen to eighteen months to get an answer. They were that far behind in the current work; and the Pension Office was really "snowed under"—was two or three years behind with current work.

At that time I had the honor to act as chairman of the subcommittee on the legislative bill. Mr. Dudley was then Commissioner of Pensions. After full investigation and discussion in committee and in the House, the force in the Records and Pension Division, if I recollect aright, was substantially doubled, and the force in the Pension Office was also substantially doubled—I think a little more than doubled. At that time both the Chief of the Records and Pension Division and the then Commissioner of Pensions stated, after investigation, as the debates and reports will show, that in their belief their offices could be up with the current work in four years from that time; that is, in 1887.

Things went on, and when the act of 1890 was passed, there had been no decrease in the force of the Pension Office up to that time. Eighteen hundred and eighty-seven had passed and almost four years more; and when the law of 1890 was enacted, there came an application for a further increase of force in the Pension Office on account of that act. If I recollect aright, an increase to the extent of 400 or 500 employees in the Pension Office was at that time authorized. Those additional employees are still with us.

In the Record and Pension Division they are up with the current work; and for the last two or three years any Department could call for the record of any soldier and get an answer inside of sixty minutes, as any gentleman can step into that office to-day and in five or ten minutes get the record of any soldier of the late war.

The head of the Record and Pension Division brought his work up and from year to year decreased the force of the office, until, if I recollect aright, there had been accomplished, several years ago, a reduction of largely more than one-half in his force of clerks.

Still the force in the Pension Office remains. Why? There is a reason for it. In that office there are a great many people employed, almost enough to make a small army, very clever people who like their jobs, as you and I would if we were in their situation. In a large number of pension claims the proof is not made, and in some cases can not be made; and when the suggestion comes to decrease that force, some Representative like my friend from Kansas, in the best of faith, no doubt, rises in his place and asks, "Are there not a great many cases undisposed of, and is it wise to decrease the force?"

And of course we desire to avoid the criticism which we should receive from pension claimants and from the country at large if we should decrease the force below what is necessary or seems to be necessary. That explains, in my opinion, why there has been no considerable decrease of force in the Pension Office. I am of opinion, and I speak deliberately and without feeling in the matter, that if that office could be administered as the Record and Pension Division has been and is now administered—it is true that the administration of the Record and Pension Division led, in the end, perhaps, to the indictment of the man at the head of it for manslaughter—but if the Pension Office could be administered as the Record and Pension Division has been administered, free from legislative influence and other influence, and perhaps as much in favor of the employees in the office as of the pension claimants, I believe that such a force could be eliminated in that office so as to make a very large decrease, while better service would be rendered than is rendered to-day.

Gentlemen may ask, Do I think it practicable to bring about such a reform? No; I do not think it is, for the reason that many clerks in that office, whenever the stability of their employment appears to be in danger, find their Member or their Senator or their friends, and the Member or the Senator or the friend is apt to respond to the importunity brought to bear upon him. I am not criticising anybody. Gentlemen understand how it is themselves.

And the head of the Pension Office would not be left at perfect freedom to eliminate from that a force that would be sufficiently effective.

And just there, Mr. Chairman, arises the suggestion as to the best plan to be adopted to make the force actually more efficient. The excuse would be given, if claims are not disposed of, that Congress has shut off a part of the clerical force, and therefore that we are not doing what could be done for the soldiers of the country under proper conditions.

Now, what is the proposition pending here? The Commissioner of Pensions, on his own motion, of his own volition, exhibits a disposition to start out and see what he can do, namely, from this great force to dispense, in his judgment, with unnecessary employees, and thinks that he can dispense with the services of ninety-five of the clerical force of that Department.

Well, with some trepidation, with a little fear and trembling, because I am about as cowardly as the average member of Congress—may be more so—but with considerable hesitation, the committee of which my friend from Pennsylvania and I are members, and, I think, with the approval of members of both sides of the committee, Republicans and Democrats, agreed, as the Commissioner of Pensions had recommended the reduction, that we would comply with his recommendation and ascertain what the result would be by a trial of the new system.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to correct the gentleman from Illinois in one respect. This recommendation was not initiated by the Commissioner of Pensions. The subcommittee having in charge the preparation of this appropriation bill requested him, after he had made his first estimate, to review.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Called him back the second time.

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes; called him back the second time for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not he could make a reduction in the force of the office without impairing its efficiency. At the second hearing before the committee he stated that he could make a reduction of $50,000 for examiners in the field and also the suggested reduction in the clerical force of the office.

It is apparent that there is a sort of sentiment for the retention of this force. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has well said that there is some disposition to deal delicately with the force; but I have not the slightest hesitation in expressing the opinion that instead of a reduction of 95 clerks in that office, there should be a reduction of at least 500 clerks. And, Mr. Chairman, when that reduction shall have been made, if it is ever made, and the "deadwood" of the office eliminated from the pay rolls of the Government, there will result, in my opinion, an expedition of the public business of the Bureau.

But the sentiment here, and the sentiment throughout the country, is absolutely standing in the way of the soldiers of the country, and is hard to overcome. Men drawing large pensions, and properly so, in most cases and perhaps in all, are carried on the rolls of the clerical force of the Pension Office who are unable by reason of the loss of an arm or a leg to perform efficient clerical service. This condition is standing in the way of the allowance of the claims of other soldiers throughout the country.

How these changes are to be made, if the reduction of the force is authorized, will of course be a matter of administration. I do not know how it will be done. It was developed in testimony a couple of years ago, in considering this Pension Office force, that there were clerks in that office whose salaries aggregated, as I now recollect it, about $116,000 annually who were below a fair standard of efficiency. But sentiment keeps these inefficient clerks in office, to the detriment of a large body of soldiers with unadjudicated claims. Inefficient clerks really stand in the way of the dispatch of public business rather than aid in expediting it.

The example of a clerk who is inefficient because of age or physical infirmity upon the other clerks who could be efficient is potential, and, in my judgment, that entire force should be overhauled in the interest of the soldiers themselves.

But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has well said that we are all a little timid, a little lacking in courage, perhaps.

Mr. Chairman, I can not say what the Commissioner of Pensions will do when he comes to execute the provisions of this amendment. I do not know whether he will drop all the Democrats or not. I apprehend, however, that if he enters upon that policy he will have hard work to find 95 Democrats among the 2,000 clerks in that office. [Laughter.] That will be one of the difficulties of the Commissioner of Pensions, if he should reach out to find Democrats in the Pension Office for slaughter under this amendment.

But that responsibility rests with the administrative department. I do not say the Commissioner of Pensions will dismiss Democrats. I trust that he will have regard for the high duties of that great position and respect his oath of office and reduce the force in harmony with the spirit of the law under which he is operating. But if he should be governed solely by political considerations, he may have some little trouble in finding the 95 Democrats. The same difficulty would be found in a great many other Departments of the Government, and that is the reason why—even with a limited number of Democrats in office—that is the reason why civil service becomes such a burning issue on this floor.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Commissioner submitted this estimate. I must concede that he will execute the law impartially and fairly until the contrary is shown. I know a reduction should be made. I am sure it should be very much larger. I voted in committee, and will vote now, to make the reduction of the clerical force as suggested by the Commissioner.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman from Missouri will pardon me, I desire to call his attention to the fact that three years ago, when he was chairman of the subcommittee and I was associated with him, this force was reduced 167.

Mr. DOCKERY. One hundred and sixty-nine.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think it was 169.

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes, and the gentleman from Maine cooperated heartily.

Mr. DINGLEY. I believed the reduction of force that was made at that time was a proper one, and I have no doubt that the reduction proposed should be made now, and that it will result in an increase of efficiency, rather than a decrease.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am glad to have the testimony of the able gentleman from Maine on that point.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if there was any evidence before the subcommittee as to how much of the work in the Pension Office arising under the act of 1890 is still unfinished?

Mr. BINGHAM. I think there is no such testimony, unless it is in the annual report. There was nothing specially said on that subject. There may have been testimony before the subcommittee having charge of the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask this question because, as I stated the other day, it was understood when the act of 1890 was passed, and a large increase in the force of the Pension Office was made, that the increase was intended to be used only for the purpose of executing that act, and that as soon as the act had been enforced the six or seven hundred clerks would be dispensed with.

Mr. BINGHAM. That testimony did not come to us in our examination, but the probabilities are that it was given when the pension appropriation bill was under consideration by the subcommittee, and it is probable that it will also appear in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TODD] desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. TODD. I should like to offer the following amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman in charge of the bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Said reduction in the force of employees to be made from the members of the various political parties in proportion to the number from each political party holding office or employed in said Department.

Mr. BINGHAM. I raise the point of order on that amendment, Mr. Chairman. If the gentleman desires to speak upon it, I have no objection to his proceeding.

Mr. TODD. I seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this provision is certainly a wise one, and one to which no one should object. A pertinent inquiry was made of the gentleman having charge of this bill, but he was very reticent in claiming any information as to how this reduction should be made. If we are to pass this amendment, I think the committee are entitled to know whether a discrimination shall be made against any of the employees on account of their political affiliations.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], a few moments ago the gentleman alluded to a reduction of 169 in the force of the Pension Office. My understanding is that those clerks were not discharged from the service, but were only transferred to other Departments of the Government, and that there was really no saving to the Government.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think there was; but the gentleman from Missouri can state.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think the gentleman from Texas is in error about that; but if the gentleman will inquire he can ascertain, as he is closer than I to a source of information that is absolutely reliable. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. There were certainly a number of transfers, but there was also a large reduction.

Mr. DOCKERY. There was. I think my friend from Texas is confused from the fact that there were some transfers. But, as I stated, the gentleman is close to information that will answer the question.

Mr. SAYERS. What I am speaking of is a reduction in the force, and not transfers.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, it is true there were a large number of clerks carried on the rolls of the Pension Office who were discharging duties in other bureaus of the Interior Department, and that these clerks were subsequently transferred to the rolls where they belonged; but there was a reduction of something over a hundred in the force.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to answer the question of the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What is the point, Mr. Chairman? We could not hear the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is that it is new legislation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, the amendment itself is new legislation, and an amendment to the amendment is no more new legislation than the other. If one goes out I think both go out.

The CHAIRMAN. No point was made against the amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand that no point was made against the amendment. The amendment itself being new legislation, I do not see how an amendment to that would go out on that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia that when the amendment was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania no point was made against it, and debate was had upon it, and under the rules it is too late now to make the point that it is new legislation. When the amendment to the amendment, putting a restriction upon it, was offered, before any discussion was had, the point of order was made; and the Chair, in accordance with previous rulings of gentlemen who have occupied the chair at other times, will sustain the point, and the question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FLEMING. Please have that amendment read again.

Mr. TODD. Have I the right to appeal as to the ruling of the Chair on its being new legislation to offer an amendment to the amendment? I would like to explain that it is simply carrying out the old legislation; that the idea of my amendment was to carry out the provisions of the civil-service act as far as possible.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Chair has already ruled on the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter it shall be the duty of the head of each Executive Department, or other Government establishment at the seat of Government not under an Executive Department, to make at the expiration of each quarter of the fiscal year a written report to the President as to the condition of the public business in his Executive Department or Government establishment, and whether any branch thereof is in arrears.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, on pages 88, 89, and 90 of this printed bill are found provisions, reformatory in their nature, which are designed to change the present law, add to the efficiency of the service, and protect the interests of the people.

I commend to the House the portions of the bill which I shall briefly discuss. I commend to the members the vigorous and earnest words of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] in support of this salutary measure, and, not disparaging the efforts now made, I am surprised that a crying evil, so clearly shown, should have been so long continued.

Under the present law clerks and other employees in the Executive Departments work seven hours a day, omitting all holidays, with a power of limitation and extension lodged in the heads of the Departments. In addition to this, they are given a vacation of one month each year with pay; still, in addition to this, they are given, with pay in its fullest extent, sixty more days' leave of absence in cases prescribed, as in case of their own sickness or sickness of a member of their family and other cases described as meritorious, thus requiring, where the limit is taken, the payment for a quarter of a year of service not performed. The Government becomes in this way an insurer not only of the health of the employees, but of members of his family, in this way opening the doors for all the ills, real and fanciful, that human flesh is heir to to the employees in the Departments and to relatives without.

So long as this provision is on the statute book, so long will human nature avail itself of it. A great discovery was made by the committee in its effort to purge the service of inefficiency. A most appalling rate of sick statistics was spread before them by the heads of the Departments.

The climate of Washington is salubrious; its air is pure, its water is bracing [laughter]; all this is shown by the fact that the death rate among the employees of the Government is not greater than elsewhere. Yet we find that under the present law that works the employees only seven hours a day, giving them a vacation of thirty days with pay each year to travel for their health, the surroundings and environments of departmental work develop a sick rate truly astonishing.

The highest average number of days of sick leave granted to each clerk was in the Interstate Commerce Commission. There are 125 employees authorized in that Bureau. There were 29 of these clerks in the classified service who asked an average of 20.89 days of sick leave in addition to their 30 days of annual leave. Out of 3,410 employees of the Interior Department, 2,383 asked for sick leave outside of their annual leave of 30 days. The average amount of sick leave requested by the Interior Department clerks was 14.76 days. In the Treasury, out of 2,745 employees, there were 1,486 who asked an average of 14.32 days of sick leave. The proportion was about the same in all the Departments.

So long as the present law exists, so long will there be untold misery, misfortune, aches, and pains that will never be heard of if the law is purged. Sickness now reaches its highest tide; the death rate remains at a dead level. [Laughter.] Some time I may prepare a table of statistics of the sick rate and compare them with the death rate and compare both with the combined experience tables, and maybe this may deter many from seeking places in the Departments for fear of the sickness that everywhere seems to pervade. Let those who seek employment in the Government service know that a day's work under the law means an honest day's work. It is a matter of common experience and knowledge that those long in the service, with such habits of ease and comfort, may contaminate the young blood rushing in from the prairies, the villages, and the cities, and cause them to fall into the same habits of ease that seem to be constitutional with some of those in the harness in the Departments at Washington.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed five minutes longer.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. A member of this body, if he performs his careful duty—and we know all do that—must work from fourteen to fifteen hours a day while Congress is in session and two-thirds of that time in vacation. Each of you within the sound of my voice knows that nearly one-third of that time is occupied in aiding the soldier to secure that pension consideration, delayed by the ennui and dilatoriness acquired through the associations and surroundings of the Departments.

We are now informed that nearly all the Departments are far in arrears in their work, and that the members of the House know full well; and for a faithful Representative to go and see the air of comfort and ease pervading some of the Departments, to see the freedom from work enjoyed, the breathing spells, the moments of rest by the weary members of this aggregation of hard-pressed mortals working seven long hours for a day, it makes that faithful Representative tired himself, especially when he knows that thousands of his constituents work for more than ten hours a day to pay them, and for less profit, and thousands of soldiers over the land, who sweat drops of blood to save their institutions for them, and those same veterans wait for weeks and weeks and months and months and years to get not a pension, but a consideration of their case, to know if they are entitled to it under the law. I will not say that most of the employees of the Departments, so far behind, idle, and are sick, but, as I call each of you to witness, I will say many.

That this evil should be corrected, and that more radically than by the measure proposed, is clear, and I hope that the proper committee, acting under the inspiration of the last few days of debate, will intensify their efforts to secure less imaginary sickness in the Departments, to the end that the arrearage of work may be closed up and that the people's work may be attended to by those in their employ.

Let it be known that those who have business at the Departments do not want those Departments in arrears. Let it be known that those who pay the salaries expect alacrity and efficiency from employees.

Let it be understood that each dollar the taxpayer pays is harder to get than heretofore.

Let it be known that abuses such as this bill seeks in part to correct are the potent causes of revolt on the part of many against their tenure; and when this is known and considered by those in places they will probably be willing to work more than seven hours, be sick less, close up the arrearages in their offices, and perform the duties they owe to the public. Failing in this, they may have the patriotism and magnanimity to surrender their places to others who will perform these duties with fidelity. Not desiring to embarrass the work of the committee, so well begun, so patriotically pressed, I feel deterred from offering an amendment cutting down even yet further the sinecure privileges enjoyed.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see at least some effort upon the part of the opposition to curtail the expenses of the Government by reducing the number of unnecessary employees in the various Departments, facing, as we do, a depleted Treasury. In this connection let me refer to the fact that even under the high tariff known as the McKinley bill there was a deficit. This deficit continued under the existence of a semiprotective tariff known as the Wilson bill, while it is admitted that under the highest of all our tariffs, the present one, known as the Dingley bill, the deficit in the Treasury continues. It is time to call a halt.

I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a clipping from the St. Louis Republic of November, 1894, which in substance states that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], while making an active canvass in Missouri in October, 1894, stated that Mr. Secretary Charles Foster had ordered bond plates to be made for the purpose of issuing bonds just a few days before the advent of the Cleveland Administration. I read from the Republic:

The Kansas City Journal wrote to Mr. Foster, asking him to give them an official denial with which to stop the mouth of Mr. DOCKERY. This Mr. Foster was willing to do, but before doing it he telegraphed the Treasury asking if there was any letter of his in existence relating to the issue of new bonds. A search was made, and no such letter was at first found. A dispatch to that effect was sent Foster. Fortified with this, and believing that all evidence of what he was about to deny had been destroyed, Foster wrote the following letter to the editor of the Kansas City Journal:

FOSTORIA, OHIO, October 22, 1894.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter in which you say that Mr. DOCKERY made the statement that near the close of the Harrison Administration I, as Secretary of the Treasury, caused plates for bonds to be engraved, and that such were prepared and the bonds ready for execution. Mr. DOCKERY was mistaken. No such action was taken. Its absurdity is so apparent that I wonder that a gentleman of Mr. DOCKERY'S intelligence should make himself responsible for such a blunder. The only bonds authorized then, as now, were those authorized by the resumption act.

Respectfully, CHARLES FOSTER.

Mr. Chairman, this is a positive denial that Mr. Foster, while Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, ordered bond plates to be prepared for the purpose of issuing bonds to the amount of $50,000,000.

I desire to state again that I have had in my hands and read the original order given by Mr. Foster, and I hold in my hand [showing it] a copy of the order from Mr. Foster, certified by the present honorable Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gage. I will read it:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 25, 1897.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, requesting the original letter, or a certified copy thereof, written by Mr. Secretary Foster February 20, 1893, addressed to the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, authorizing the preparation of certain plates. In compliance with said request, I submit below a copy of the letter in question; also a copy of the text of the proposed bond.

[Copy of letter.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1893.

SIR: You are hereby authorized and directed to prepare designs for the 3 per cent bonds provided in a Senate amendment to sundry civil bill now pending. The denominations which should first receive attention are 100's and 1,000's of the coupon bonds, and 100's, 1,000's, and 10,000's of the registered bonds. This authority is given in advance of the enactment in view of pressing contingencies, and you are directed to hasten the preparation of the designs and plates in every possible manner. I inclose a memorandum for your guidance in preparing the script for the body of the bonds.

Respectfully, yours,

CHARLES FOSTER, Secretary.

To the CHIEF OF THE BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

TEXT OF THE BOND.

"WASHINGTON, April 1, 1893.

"This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of section —— of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1893, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of April, A. D. 1898, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said March 3, 1893, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, payable semiannually on the 1st days of October and April in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form, by or under State, municipal, or local authority."

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is part of the history of the McKinley bill. In reporting that bill to the House in 1890, Mr. McKinley used this language:

Ample revenues for the wants of the Government are provided by this bill, and every reasonable encouragement is given to productive enterprises and to the labor employed therein.

In the face of this statement this prophecy of the distinguished gentleman, now President of the United States, we find the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] saying in the Senate, July 24, 1897, thus:

But it will be said that this deficiency began under the McKinley Act. That is true. It began because of the election of 1892. * * *

Now, Mr. Chairman, to show that the election of 1892 had nothing to do with this deficit, I again quote from Mr. Foster, who, while testifying before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, February 25, 1893, said:

Now, I want to say to you these estimates are based upon conditions existing prior to the late election.

That is, Mr. Chairman, the late election of 1892. He wanted then to increase the revenues $50,000,000 permanently. At the last session, that is, the extra session of this Congress, it was stated on the floor of the House that this order was given for bond plates, and it was flatly disputed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who said:

I hope the gentleman [Mr. MCMILLIN] will not again put that old story in circulation. It was false in its origin and it is false to-day.

It is remarkable, I may add, that although this order was given February 20, 1893, and the plates were being made, thereafter, February 25, 1893, Mr. Secretary Foster testified before the Ways and Means Committee of the House without stating that he had given it. [Applause.]

Mr. BINGHAM. On behalf of the Committee on Appropriations I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 90, after line 24, insert the following:

"That paragraph 9 of chapter 143, act of March 3, 1883 (Supplement to Revised Statutes, volume 1, page 421), be amended by adding thereto the following proviso, to wit:

"'And provided further, That the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States shall make to the Secretary of the Treasury a semiannual report of all the fees and emoluments of his office, under the same regulations as are provided for governing clerks of other courts of the United States, under section 833 of the Revised Statutes, in making their reports to the Attorney-General.'

"That paragraph 7 of chapter 332, act of July 7, 1884 (Supplement to Revised Statutes, volume 1, page 469), be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to say, after careful examination of this amendment, that I think it is entirely proper.

Mr. BINGHAM. I believe it requires no explanation.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will print in the RECORD the correspondence with the Department on this subject, and also the brief which was submitted to the committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent to print the documents which the gentleman from Missouri mentions.

There was no objection.

The documents are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1897.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copies of two proposed bills, one amending the act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. L., 631), and the other repealing paragraph 7 of chapter 332, act of July 7, 1884 (Suppl. R. S., volume 1, page 469), the reason for said proposed enactments being more fully set forth in a small brief which is also herewith transmitted.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

Hon. J. G. CANNON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That paragraph 9 of chapter 143, act of March 3, 1883 (Supplement to Revised Statutes, volume 1, page 421), be amended by adding thereto the following proviso, to wit: "And provided further, That the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States shall make to the Secretary of the Treasury a semiannual report of all the fees and emoluments of his office, under the same regulations as are provided for governing clerks of other courts of the United States, under section 833, Revised Statutes, in making their reports to the Attorney-General."

PROPOSED REPEAL.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That paragraph 7 of chapter 332, act of July 7, 1884 (Supplement to Revised Statutes, volume 1, page 469), be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

IN RE ACCOUNTS AND RETURNS OF CLERK OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. L., 631):

* * * "Provided, That the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States shall not hereafter retain of the fees and emoluments of his office for his personal compensation, over and above his necessary clerk hire and the incidental expenses of his office, certified to by the court or by one of its justices appointed by it for that purpose, and to be audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, a sum exceeding $6,000 a year, or exceeding that rate for any time less than a year, and the surplus of such fees and emoluments shall be paid into the Treasury as provided by law in cases of clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States: And provided further, That the Supreme Court is hereby authorized and empowered to prepare the table of fees to be charged by the clerk thereof." * * *

Act of July 7, 1884 (23 Stat. L., 224):

Provided, That the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States shall, on the 1st day of January next, or within thirty days thereafter, and annually thereafter, make to the Secretary of the Treasury a return of all costs collected by him in cases disposed of at a preceding term or terms of said Supreme Court; and, after deducting his compensation as provided by law, and the incidental expenses of his office, including clerk hire, said expenses to be certified by the Chief Justice or a justice of said court, shall pay any surplus that may remain into the Treasury of the United States at the time of making said return.

The act of March 2, 1883 (22 Stat. L., 631), provides that the maximum personal compensation of the clerk of the Supreme Court shall be $6,000; that his personal compensation, his necessary clerk hire, and the incidental expenses of his office are to be retained by him from the "fees and emoluments of his office;" that the Supreme Court be authorized to prepare a table of fees to be charged by the clerk thereof; that the surplus of such fees and emoluments of his office, over and above his office expenses and necessary clerk hire, shall be paid into the Treasury, as provided by law in cases of clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States; that the amount retained shall be audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

The table of fees established by the Supreme Court, in pursuance of the act of March 3, 1883, to be charged by the clerk of said court, contains 17 paragraphs, 15 of which relate to fees or costs in cases and 2 of which (Nos. 11 and 17) relate to fees or costs that may be charged for services performed not in connection with cases on trial.

In pursuance of the act of March 3, 1883, authorizing and empowering this court to prepare a table of fees to be charged by the clerk of this court, the following table is adopted:

1. For docketing a case and filing and indorsing the transcript of the record, $5.
2. For entering an appearance, 25 cents.
3. For entering a continuance, 25 cents.
4. For filing a motion, order, or other paper, 25 cents.
5. For entering any rule, or for making or copying any record or other paper, 20 cents per folio of each 100 words.
6. For transferring each case to a subsequent docket and indexing the same, $1.
7. For entering a judgment or decree, $1.
8. For every search of the records of the court, $1.
9. For a certificate and seal, $2.
10. For receiving, keeping, and paying money in pursuance of any statute or order of court, 2 per cent on the amount so received, kept, and paid.
11. For an admission to the bar and certificate under seal, $10.
12. For preparing the record or a transcript thereof for the printer, indexing the same, supervising the printing and distributing the printed copies to the justices, the reporter, the Law Library, and the parties or their counsel, 15 cents per folio.
13. For making a manuscript copy of the record, when required, under rule 10, 20 cents per folio, but nothing in addition for supervising the printing.
14. For issuing a writ of error and accompanying papers, $5.
15. For a mandate or other process, $5.
16. For filing briefs, $5 for each party appearing.
17. For every copy of any opinion of the court, or any justice thereof, certified under seal, $1 for every printed page, but not to exceed $5 in the whole for any copy.

The clerk has never furnished a report including the fees received by him under paragraphs 11 and 17 of the fee bill, and although he has been frequently requested to make a report including said fees, he has declined to do so, claiming that the act of July 7, 1884, (23 Stat. L. 224) repeals that portion of the act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. L., 631), providing that he shall include in his emolument returns the "fees and emoluments of his office," and contending that it requires him to include therein only "all costs collected by him in cases disposed of at preceding terms of said Supreme Court." His returns do not include any fees collected under paragraphs 11 and 17, and as no returns of said fees have been made, it is evident that all of such fees as have been collected by him have not been paid into the Treasury, but have been retained by him, in excess of $6,000 personal compensation annually charged by him in his returns. How much these fees, not included in the clerk's returns, amount to can not be estimated, but it is clear that they aggregate a considerable sum, for paragraph 11 provides for a fee of $10 for every admission to the bar, and paragraph 17 a fee of $1 per printed page for all copies of opinions furnished.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. BINGHAM was adopted.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. Res. 103) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1897, on the 17th day of said month.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

To the Committee on Printing.

Concurrent resolution No. 20—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 8,000 additional copies, in cloth binding, of the Second Special Report of the Commissioner of Labor, comprising the labor laws of the United States and of the State and Territorial governments, being a report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, submitted July 20, 1892, and revised and annotated in accordance with concurrent resolution adopted March 5, 1896, 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 3,500 copies for distribution by the Department of Labor—

To the Committee on Printing.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 4753) making appropriations for certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 103) to pay officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1897, on the 17th day of said month.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SHERMAN, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. FERGUSSON, for two weeks, on account of important business.

COMMITTEE CHANGES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. EPES] desires to be excused from service on the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] from the Committee on the Territories. If there be no objection, these changes will be made, and the Chair will appoint to the vacancies thus made the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill (H. R. 4210) providing for the representation of the United States at any international monetary conference, etc., will be referred from the Committee on Ways and Means to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Also, the letter from the Secretary of War, relating to money accounts of the Army, from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

And House Document No. 114, so much of it as relates to the pay, etc., of the Army, from the Committee on Appropriations to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There was no objection.

And then, on motion of Mr. BINGHAM (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of an appropriation for the survey of lands in the Indian Territory—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of appropriation for the purchase of land adjoining the military reservation of Fort Harrison, Mont.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2121) for the relief of James W. Howell, late of Company H, Fifty-fourth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2831) to correct the military record of Perry J. Knoles, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. By a clerical error the bill (S. 2149) for the relief of Richard C. Silence, for the purpose of correcting his military record, was referred to the Committee on Claims. I move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I supposed it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee has already acted upon it; but I see by the indorsement on the bill that it went to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Without objection, the Committee on Claims will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report without amendment the bill (S. 2149) for the relief of Richard C. Silence, and to submit a report thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2553) to authorize the construction of a steel bridge over the Snake River, between the States of Washington and Idaho, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2754) to amend sections 431 and 432 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Hydrographic Office in the Navy Department, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1099) to authorize the Light-House Board to pay to Chamblin, Delaney & Scott the sum of $2,125, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1863) for the establishment of a light-house at the pitch of Cape Fear River, near Wilmington, N. C., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 626) for the establishment of a light-house and fog signal at a point north of the bell buoy near the broken part of the Pollock Rip Shoals, on the coast of Massachusetts, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 351) to authorize the Auditor for the Interior Department to settle and adjust the accounts of E. C. Chirouse, Indian agent at the Tulalip Agency, Wash., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FAIRBANKS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1055) appropriating money to pay the claim of the Western Paving and Supply Company, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills pending before said committee, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE ON THE YUKON RIVER.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2793) for the purchase or construction of a vessel for the Revenue-Cutter Service on the Yukon River, Alaska, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I am instructed by the same committee to ask for its immediate consideration. It is a case requiring very prompt action. The purpose is to supply a revenue cutter for the Yukon River, and it ought to be ready by early spring, as soon as the river opens, the cutter being an absolute necessity, and the Government now having no vessel properly constructed. The draft must not be over 2½ feet.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in line 5, after the word "for," and before the word "service," to insert "revenue cutter;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase or have constructed for the Revenue-Cutter Service a suitable vessel for revenue-cutter service on the Yukon River, Alaska; and the sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated and made immediately available to purchase or build such vessel.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AND ITS TRIBUTARIES.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the powers and duties conferred upon the Committee on Commerce in and by the resolution of May 10, 1897, a copy of which resolution is hereto attached and made a part hereof, be, and the same hereby are, continued in force, and the said committee are hereby directed to proceed with and continue the work prescribed in said resolution in the manner therein prescribed, and the expenses of the same shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, as provided in the original resolution. The time for the committee in which to make report is hereby extended to April 1, 1898.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently reported without amendment the above resolution from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ESTATE OF POM K. SOH.

Mr. MORGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2764) for the relief of the heirs of Pom K. Soh, deceased, to report it without amendment, and I ask that the Senate will immediately consider it. I desire to make a very brief statement about the bill.

This gentleman, a man of eminence for his abilities, and also of very fine character, formerly minister from Korea, died here. He was actually an American citizen, and had become naturalized on filing his application in the State of New Jersey and perfecting it in the District of Columbia. It turns out that the laws of the United States do not permit his widow and heirs to take a title to a piece of land that he bought while he was here for a residence in the city of Washington. He married a lady who is a native of Korea, and she is entitled to dower. His next of kin are entitled, of course, to the fee of the estate, but they can not get it because they are aliens. There is a mortgage, or rather a vendor's lien, upon the property, which is due some time early in January, and it will be foreclosed and the estate will be deprived of any opportunity of buying it in, for those people can not own land in the District of Columbia. The bill provides for a mere quitclaim conveyance of whatever interest the United States or the District of Columbia may have in the little lot. I therefore ask the Senate to consider the bill and pass it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to have printed in the RECORD a statement of facts on which the bill is based, so that when it goes to the other House they will have the facts before them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being no objection, that order will be made.

The paper referred to is as follows:

The legal right of Mr. Pom K. Soh to purchase, convey, or transmit by inheritance real estate in the District of Columbia.

I.—RIGHT TO PURCHASE.

An act of Congress dated March 3, 1887 (24 Stat., 476), makes it "unlawful" for persons not citizens of the United States, or who have not declared their intention to become such citizens, "to hereafter acquire, hold, or own real estate so hereafter acquired, or any interest therein, in any of the Territories of the United States or in the District of Columbia."

This law, however, excepts from its prohibition, among other cases, those "in which the right to hold or dispose of lands in the United States is secured by existing treaties to the citizens or subjects of foreign countries, and excepts also such as may be acquired by inheritance." * * *

Considering Mr. Soh as one who had not become a citizen of the United States or declared his intention to become one, he had the right under the treaty between the United States and Korea to purchase land in the District. The language of that treaty applicable thereto is: "Subjects of Chosen who may visit the United States shall be permitted to reside and to rent premises, purchase land," etc. (See Article VI of the treaty, in "Treaties and conventions," 218.)

As a matter of fact, Mr. Soh declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States on the 24th day of May, 1889, before the clerk of the court of common pleas of Middlesex County, N. J., and on the 18th day of November, 1892, was admitted to such citizenship by the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

But, as it may prove that the court was without power to confer this citizenship upon a Korean, in view of the decisions of the Federal courts in In re Saito, 62 Federal Reporter, 126; In re Ah Yup, 5 Sawyer, 155, and In re Mai, 21 Pacific Reporter, 903, or as it may be held that he renounced such citizenship by returning to Korea and accepting office under the King of that country just prior to the purchase of land in the District, attention is called to his treaty rights in this respect as a Korean.

II.—RIGHT TO CONVEY.

Having the right under the treaty, which is not affected by the act of Congress of 1887, to purchase land, Mr. Soh had the undoubted right to convey it by will or deed to a citizen of the United States or of Korea residing in the United States, because the word "purchase" in the treaty comprehends any method of acquisition of realty except by descent or operation of law.

III.—RIGHT TO TRANSMIT BY INHERITANCE.

The alien relatives of Mr. Soh—his widow and his sisters in Seoul—can not acquire this property by inheritance under the language of the treaty, which confers the right of acquiring real estate in the United States only upon Koreans who visit this country, and the ladies mentioned have never been here; and, moreover, this privilege is only "to purchase," not to inherit.

But the strict rule of the common law that aliens can not take real estate by inheritance has been modified by the act of Maryland of 1791, "concerning the Territory of Columbia and the city of Washington."

Section 6 of this act provides that "any foreigner may, by deed or will hereafter to be made, take and hold lands within that part of the said Territory which lies within this State [since 184— all of the District is confined to the part ceded by Maryland] in the same manner as if he was a citizen of this State, and the same lands may be conveyed by him and transmitted to and inherited by his heirs and relations as if he and they were citizens of this State."

Though the act of Congress of 1887, above cited, considerably restricts the privileges conferred by the law just quoted, yet it expressly permits aliens to acquire land in the Territories of the United States and in this District "by inheritance."

There can be no doubt that there is no disability on the part of these ladies to inherit these lands from an alien.

But the Supreme Court of the United States, construing the Maryland act of 1791, have held that it does not remove the disability arising from common-law principles of an alien to inherit lands here from a citizen. Spratt vs. Spratt, 1 Peters, 343 (7; 171), and 4 Peters, 393 (7; 879); De Geoffrey vs. Riggs, 133 U. S. See also, Jost vs. Jost, 1 Mackey, 493.

Under this statute, therefore, these heirs could not take by inheritance lands in this District acquired and held by a citizen of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, the 18th day of December, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Wednesday, January 5, 1898.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN THE VALLEY OF THE YUKON.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to make a favorable report upon the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE], being the joint resolution (S. R. 72) for the relief of American miners and other sufferers in the valley of the Yukon and its tributaries.

After full consultation with the Secretary of War and with the Major-General Commanding the Army, it was thought that certain details should be included and the matter set forth with more particularity. So we report as an amendment a substitute to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert what I send to the desk, asking consent for its immediate consideration. The reasons for early action are quite obvious. The other House is likely to act very soon. I may state that this morning the committee of the House has been considering the matter, and the sooner it is done the better for a variety of reasons. I ask that the joint resolution be read and immediately considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 72) for the relief of American miners and other sufferers in the valley of the Yukon and its tributaries.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended (or so much thereof as may be necessary), in the discretion and under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the purchase of subsistence stores, supplies, and material for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country, or other mining regions of Alaska, and to purchase transportation and provide means for the distribution of such stores and supplies, and such other supplies as may be contributed by the citizens of Oregon and others: Provided, That with the consent of the Canadian Government first obtained, the Secretary of War may cause the relief herein provided for to be extended into Canadian territory.

SEC. 2. That the said subsistence stores, supplies, and materials may be sold in said country at such prices as shall be fixed by the Secretary of War, or donated, where he finds people in need and unable to pay for the same.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, purchase and import reindeer and employ and bring into the country reindeer drivers or herders not citizens of the United States, or provide such other means of transportation as in his judgment he may deem practicable. The said reindeer or other outfit may be sold and disposed of by the Secretary of War when he shall have no further use for them under the provision of this act, and the proceeds arising from all sales herein authorized shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator having charge of the joint resolution if the language used will be sufficient to authorize the Secretary of War to contract with the Hudson Bay Company and persons who are engaged in transportation on the Red River. I was informed by a gentleman who has been very familiar with that country, and who spent several winters there, that they would probably be able to send provisions across by that route. It is a long distance, but he thought they could be safely relied upon to send provisions across at any season of the year. All that is necessary is to have the language sufficiently broad, so that if the Secretary of War should find that the best mode of getting in with the provisions he might adopt it. I do not know whether the language is broad enough.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the expressions here are very general. They were intended to be so. I know that the General of the Army considered them as such. For example, he said he thought oxen would probably be taken up there to haul the stores across a portion of the country, and that they would answer for food when they were done with them.

Mr. STEWART. The Hudson Bay Company operates in the Red River, and of course if the Secretary could deal with them, he might have the provisions carried by that route.

Mr. HAWLEY. The expression is "to purchase transportation and provide means." That the General of the Army and the Secretary of War also consider as full discretion to get supplies into that country.

Mr. SPOONER. There is no limitation?

Mr. HAWLEY. There is no limitation as to where or from whom he shall purchase.

Mr. STEWART. I think probably it can be done better through the Hudson Bay Company than by any other means.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Secretary will probably do that, especially after the suggestion the Senator has made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 2863) to repeal an act entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," approved March 2, 1893, as amended by an act of Congress approved January 21, 1896, and to provide for the extension of certain streets and avenues, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (S. 2864) to correct the military record of Newton Boughn; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. QUAY introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 2865) granting a pension to Thomas Chase (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2866) granting a pension to Peter E. Shipler; and

A bill (S. 2867) granting a pension to Emma H. Fraser.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 2868) for the recognition of the military service of the officers and enlisted men of certain military organizations; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 2869) for the relief of John F. Anderson and Cary C. Barr; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 2870) for the relief of Meta R. M. Phillips; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2871) to repeal certain provisos in an act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1897; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 2872) to amend section 1370 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the Medical Corps of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

R. 75) accepting the invitation of the Government of Norway to take part in an international fisheries exposition to be held at the city of Bergen, Norway, from May to September, A. D. 1898; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on International Expositions.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 82) restoring the Santee Sioux Indians, of Nebraska, and the Flandreau Indians, of South Dakota, formerly known as and being a confederacy of the Medawakanton and Wapakoota Sioux Indians, to all rights, privileges, and benefits enjoyed by them and their ancestors under the treaties of 1837 and 1851, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 373) for the restoration of annuities to the Sisseton and Wahpeton bands of Dakota or Sioux Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 119) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act and other acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, and to provide for the settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of Central Pacific and Western Pacific railroads; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

EMPLOYEES IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate if there are any supernumerary employees in the Treasury Department or any of its several bureaus or branches, and if so, to furnish a list of their names and salaries or the compensation paid them; and, further, to inform the Senate if any persons in the Treasury Department or any of its several bureaus or branches have been retired from active service and are drawing pay or compensation from the Government, and if so, give the name or names of such persons and the compensation they are paid, when they were so retired, and for what cause or causes.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with an itemized statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Central Pacific Railroad for each year from 1871 to 1897, said statement to show the amounts expended for subsidies to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company and the amount paid into the sinking fund each year.

REVENUE CUTTERS OFF THE FLORIDA COAST.

Mr. CANNON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to transmit to the Senate, at his earliest convenience, a statement showing (a) what, if any, revenue cutters of the United States, since March 4, 1897, have been maintained off the coast of Florida, or in waters contiguous, to thwart attempts to violate the neutrality laws; (b) what attempts, if any, at such violation have been so thwarted; (c) what vessels, if any, have been captured while engaged in violation or alleged violation of neutrality laws; (d) the names of and details concerning such vessels, if any, so captured, which were armed and equipped to cruise with hostile intent against any power at peace with the United States or were accompanied by a military expedition; (e) by what authority of law such captures, if any, were made, and what disposition has been made of the vessels, their contents, crews, and passengers, if any, so captured.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be authorized to employ a stenographer to report hearings before said committee during the present session of Congress.

COURTS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 2365) to amend the Indian appropriation act of June 7, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The House has, at the request of the Senate, just returned Senate bill 2365, and I move that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered.

Mr. FRYE. What is the bill?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is a bill proposing to suspend a clause in the Indian appropriation act which transferred the jurisdiction of Indian courts in the Indian Territory to Federal courts until such time as the Senate should act on an agreement between the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations and the United States, which was then pending. Since that time the Chickasaw Nation have rejected the agreement; it is not now pending, and there is no necessity for passing the bill. For that reason I move that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that in the opinion of the present occupant of the chair, the bill having been passed at the last session of Congress, the action can only be taken by unanimous consent. Does the Senator ask for unanimous consent?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent, then, that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the vote whereby the bill (S. 2365) to amend the Indian appropriation act of June 7, 1897, and for other purposes, was passed be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR. Does that application come, formally or informally, from the committee?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes, sir; the action that is proposed was recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOAR. Without objection?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Without objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the vote will be regarded as having been reconsidered.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, without objection.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, if he does not deem it incompatible with the public interest, to send to the Senate a copy of his instructions to the special commissioners sent to Europe during the current year to negotiate the holding of an international bimetallic monetary conference, their report or reports to him, and all such correspondence relating to the subject as he may have.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, the special commissioners or envoys appointed by the President in April last have not made as yet any report to the President of their proceedings. The English Government, of its own motion, published a résumé of the negotiations which took place in England, which, by the President's message, I learn is to be laid before the Senate. I do not know whether or not that has yet been done. I procured as many copies as possible on the other side and sent them, as far as they would go, to members of the Senate. I apprehend that the document has not yet come to the Senate, but will soon be here.

I hope, Mr. President, and intend at the earliest convenient day, to make a statement to the Senate respecting the proceedings of the special commission. I must make such statement, of course, unofficially and as a Senator. I can make it with propriety to this body, for it was in the Senate that the idea of the appointment of a commission originated, and it was through this body that it was pressed to a conclusion in cooperation with the House of Representatives. I had hoped to make such a statement at an earlier day. I have been away from the United States for nine months out of twelve during the past year. I found on my return an immense accumulation of local routine matters, and I have not as yet been able to devote myself for a moment to the subject. I hope to be able to do so as soon after the recess as possible; and I expect by about the middle of next month, if possible, to say to the Senate whatever I can say respecting the mission. Pending that, the matter contained in the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska might perhaps, with his permission, lie over. I am not tenacious about it; but it is very possible that after the subject has been somewhat discussed, the Senator may desire, perhaps, to modify or change his resolution. That I leave entirely with him. It is a matter with which this statement naturally does not concern itself.

While I am on my feet, I will ask leave to have published as a miscellaneous document a translation, which was only finished this morning, of a most important and able speech made in the Chamber of Deputies by M. Méline, the premier and secretary of agriculture of the French Government, on the 20th of November last, in which he deals at some length with questions cognate to that on which the bimetallic mission went abroad. He deals with the depression of agriculture in the Republic of France, and shows that in the last fifteen years the revenues from agriculture have fallen off 500,000,000 francs. He deals with the depression of prices as affected by transportation, and shows how, except as to a few of the cereals, the question of transportation does not seriously affect values. He deals also with the question of overproduction, and shows that as to most of the products of agriculture in France the question of overproduction in no wise affects prices. He shows that the steady and constant depreciation of agricultural values in France comes solely from the competition between the gold countries and the silver countries. He deals as well with the results of the joint efforts of the representative of France and the envoys of the United States in dealing with the English Government upon the question of reopening the mints of the world to the free coinage of silver, and comments upon it.

I ask the permission of the Senate that the translation of the speech may be printed as a miscellaneous document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARTER in the chair). In the absence of objection, the paper referred to will be printed as a document.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado is satisfied that the report will be made——

Mr. MORGAN. With the permission of the Senator from Nebraska, I wish to inquire if there is any objection to printing in the RECORD the document which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] has sent to the desk?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should be very glad to have it printed where it will receive the greatest publicity. I know it will be of interest to all members of the Senate and to the country generally.

Mr. MORGAN. I make that motion, and in conjunction with that I will send to the Secretary's desk a letter from the Director of the Mint, which I received this morning, and ask that it be read and also printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. I did not understand that the request of the Senator from Alabama was submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Alabama was supplemented by the further request that the paper now to be read by the Secretary should likewise be printed in the RECORD, as the Chair understands.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator will not press the printing of the speech of the French premier in the RECORD. Our RECORD has become exceedingly voluminous now, and it is a very serious thing to exclude anything if we admit anything other than the natural and orderly proceedings of the Senate. I think, on the whole, I am as much interested in that document as any Senator can be, and I have no doubt, if I understand correctly the opinions of the distinguished premier of France, that I sympathize with his views, but I feel constrained to object to the printing of the speech in the RECORD.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to complete my proposition before I press it upon the attention of the Senate. My proposition will not be completed until I put the Senate in possession of the letter which I have just now sent to the Secretary's desk. So I ask for the reading of that letter, and upon that I shall predicate my motion to print both.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter submitted by the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF THE MINT,
Washington, D. C., December 14, 1897.

SIR: At the request of Senator JOHN T. MORGAN of Alabama, I send you the following information:

Russia has not ceased to coin silver. It coined, in 1894, silver to the amount of only $253,861. In 1895 it coined silver amounting to the value of $3,696,192, and in 1896 the large sum of $30,985,066. Russia is now coining silver to take the place of the small notes. The ratio in coinage between gold and silver in Russia is as 1 of gold to 15½ of silver.

Respectfully, yours,

R. E. PRESTON,
Director of the Mint.

Mr. T. G. GARRET,
Office of the Secretary of the Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, of course that paper will go into the RECORD, because it has been read at the Secretary's desk.

I desire also that the paper submitted by the honorable Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] shall go into the RECORD, for the reason that, notwithstanding his very clear statement about the purport of the paper, we have not got a definite idea of it in the sense that we want to obtain it. The paper was of sufficient value to attract the attention of our recent ambassadors to European powers and a Senator of the United States, and I can see no objection at all to furnishing all of the contents of that paper to the Congress of the United States and to as many people as may read the RECORD. I can not quite understand why the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] should make any objection to the country becoming possessed of this very important statement, and I therefore move that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the paper presented by the Senator from Colorado, supplemented by the communication presented by the Senator from Alabama, be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. I desire to object to the printing in the RECORD of a long address. Let it be printed as a separate document. I do not object to printing the communication of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not ask unanimous consent. I made a motion to print.

Mr. HOAR. I did not make any objection to that.

Mr. MORGAN. I say, as to the printing in the RECORD, I made a motion to that effect, and I desire that that motion shall be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Very well, then; let the motion go over until to-morrow, under the rule.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, Mr. President, I call for the reading of the paper. We do not know what it is.

Mr. HOAR. Let that go over until to-morrow, under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] moves that the document presented be printed in the RECORD. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], invoking the rules, requests that the motion go over until to-morrow. It is so ordered. Now the Senator from Alabama asks that the communication presented by the Senator from Colorado be read to the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose that goes over with the motion.

Mr. MORGAN. I called for the reading of the paper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And to that request the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has objected.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that a motion of this kind, there being one motion now before the Senate, can not take the place of the pending question.

Mr. ALLEN. Why can not time be saved by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] reading the translation himself? Let the Senator from Colorado read the translation himself.

Mr. WHITE. And incorporate it in his remarks.

Mr. HOAR. Undoubtedly, Mr. President, if any Senator desires to force upon the Senate a departure from its just and ordinary rules, he can do so by reading any document at length.

Mr. ALLEN. There is nothing in violation of the rules for the Senator to read the paper if he wants to.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the rules permit that.

Mr. ALLEN. To do so would violate neither the letter nor the spirit of the rules.

Mr. HOAR. I simply submit, if I may be allowed a moment, that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is the record of the proceedings of this body, and their exact character is essential to the reputation of every Senator on this floor. It prevents us from being at the mercy of the newspapers, and it is desirable on our own account that it shall be in a form which will be read and understood by the people, in a cheap, portable, convenient, and compact form. If we get in the habit of crowding matter into it so that you get a series of volumes like that of the Encyclopedia Britannica, as we are doing now, to record the proceedings of every long session of the Senate, it makes the RECORD worthless, or nearly so, for the purpose for which it was designed.

I selected to make this objection a document for which I have the profoundest respect, and for which I desire to have the widest circulation. I want my people—if there is any part of the country "my people," and not the whole—I want the whole people to understand the grave and serious reasons which warranted the mission of which the Senator from Colorado was a part, and to know how earnestly this matter, sometimes represented as trivial or a pretense, lay at the heart of the great French Republic.

I have not in the objection I have made, therefore, any want of respect for that document, but I have selected it as a document on which to make the objection. I believe it is poor policy for all of us to crowd up this RECORD.

This document can be printed. It will not be sent in RECORD form to a large number of people. It can be printed in document form in twenty-four hours, and the number which we can print by repeated orders is unlimited under the statute. That is a matter within the power of the Senate, and it does seem to me that the objection I have made is a reasonable and just objection, dictated by no disrespect to the Senator from Alabama. I submit, with all respect, that it is not a fair use of the rule to compel the Senate to print in the RECORD a document which we do not desire to have read aloud here at this time, or to compel the lumbering up of the RECORD with matter which it was never designed it should contain. That is the reason of my objection. Of course, if the Senator from Alabama chooses to rise and have this paper read when he has the floor for a speech, it will be put into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With reference to the request presented by the Senator from Alabama, the Chair calls attention to Rule XI, which provides that—

> When the reading of a paper is called for, and objected to, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, without debate.

Under that rule, the Chair holds that the question of the reading of the paper requested by the Senator from Alabama shall be so decided by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I will withdraw the objection in deference to the high character and my profound respect for the Senator from Alabama. If, after I have stated my reasons, he persists in his request, I shall not persist in the objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, Mr. President, I insist upon my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has withdrawn his objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that the paper be printed in the RECORD.

I should like to say, if I may, to the Senator from Massachusetts, that the translation I have submitted is of a portion only of the speech of M. Méline; that it is not long, and that, while the request is unusual, I believe the speech to have been of a most unusual and important character, and of such a nature that there would be, I think, in the breast of the Senator from Massachusetts, no feeling that the proper uses of the RECORD had been abused when he sees the remarks in print.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed in the RECORD and as a separate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama, the document referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. COCKRELL. And also as a document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been previously ordered.

The translation of the speech referred to is as follows:

[Portion of a speech of M. Méline, president of the council and minister of agriculture, delivered in the French Chamber of Deputies on the 20th of November, 1897.]

GENTLEMEN: Last week I endeavored to show that the remedy proposed by the socialists for the prevailing agricultural distress is worse than the disease, and would only aggravate the evil by destroying the principle of individual proprietorship, which is the essential factor in the power of resistance of our agricultural interest in the uneven contest which it must sustain. I think I proved that collectivist proprietorship would be a retrogression and a positive relapse into barbarism. I acknowledge that socialism would thus attain its ends; the wealthy class would cease to exist, but the poor would be poorer; that would be the only result of this social revolution which is heralded with so much clamor.

To-day I wish to oppose to the collectivist solution of this problem our solution, which differs at all points from theirs.

In the first place our methods differ. We do not start from an ideal conception; from an a priori assumption. We observe facts; we follow, step by step, the development of the agricultural crisis, and we seek to apply, little by little, such correctives as will diminish the sufferings of our rural population. In order to discover the remedy it is necessary to ascertain the cause, or rather the causes, of the disease. This is the first question which I must investigate before this honorable body.

Where is the root of the agricultural crisis? A slight examination of the question suffices to direct attention to an economic phenomenon of grave importance, which inspires great anxiety for the future. I speak of the general and progressive depreciation of all products of the soil, without exception, which has taken place during the last fifteen, I may say the last twenty years. This is a fact which can not be too clearly recognized, and on which it is necessary to dwell in order to enlighten public opinion.

Statistics and official market reports furnish data on this head which it is necessary to condense. I have therefore caused to be prepared a table of the principal agricultural products, based upon the quotations for 1882 and 1897, thus showing at an interval of fifteen years the general movement of prices in our markets.

I ask your permission, gentlemen, by a few indispensable quotations from this table, to demonstrate beyond a doubt the consequences of this depreciation in values which was hitherto unobserved.

Here is the value of certain products in 1882 and 1897:

Wool, which brought, in 1882, 1.85 to 2.05 francs, in 1897 sold for 1.08 to 1.25 francs; new cocoons, worth, in 1882, 4.70 to 4.45 francs, in 1897 fell to 2.50 to 2.95 francs; tallow declined from 95 francs in 1882 to 42 francs in 1897; refined sugars from 36 to 25 francs; farinaceous foods from 32-34 to 27-28 francs; vinegar from 38-40 to 30-35 francs. Even butter, which suffered less change, fell from 3.35-3.50 to 1.80-1.90 francs.

The comparison for wheat is more difficult on account of the uncertainty of the harvests; but it is not impracticable, by a series of averages, to ascertain the general tendency of prices. It is certain that, by comparing averages for periods of five years, one can approximate closely to the truth; for the reason that good and bad crops alternate in tolerably rapid succession. By thus grouping the harvests in periods of five years, beginning with 1877, we arrive at the following results: From 1877 to 1881 the price of the quintal of wheat was from 29 to 30 francs; from 1882 to 1886 it fell to 24.03 francs; from 1887 to 1891 it brought 24.86 francs, prices remaining stationary but much lower than during the first period; and on arriving at the last period, from 1892 to 1896, we find the quintal of wheat has fallen to 20.53 francs.

You see, gentlemen, that by this cursory statement of statistics, which, though somewhat dry, was necessary, I have proved my proposition that the fall in agricultural products has been general, that it has affected all, and that it has been phenomenal.

I know of no exception unless we refer to meats; and even there we find a slight diminution of the price received by the producer. I am, therefore, clearly justified in the deduction that the fall has been general.
